TO COOL HIS WARSHIP.

The White Squadron Was Commander Francis Wilde's Own Idea.

[New York Mail and Express.]

Notwithstanding it has been so much written about and so enthusiastically praised, the story of how the white squadron originated has never yet been told in print. Nor would it be now, had it not come, accidentally, into the possession of the writer.

Commander George Francis Faxon Wilde, who has just been selected to the command of the ram Katahdin, one of the most wicked and destructive of all the naval fleet, belonged to the famous class which entered the naval academy in the fall of 1861, and took the four years' course in three years. Young Wilde was two years and nine months in getting through. He was graduated in the high honor list, away at the head of the class. He was a Massachusetts boy, born in the old town of Braintree. He very early determined that he would follow the sea, not as a common sailor, but in an official capacity, but as a midshipman in the navy. In the autumn of 1861 he learned that there was to be an appointment to the naval academy from his district, and applied for it. He was told that he was the eighteenth applicant, but that if he chose to take the examination, he might have his chance.

That did not frighten him. He determined to make the trial. He did not tell anyone what he was going to do. If he won it would be time enough to tell. If he failed, no one would know of his failure but himself.

THE FIT DOES IT.

It's the fit of our suits that contributes most to their popularity. When a man gets good cloth and honest tailoring in his clothes he is pleased, of course, though he's entitled to that much anyhow. But when, in addition, he gets a fit that he didn't believe could be had in ready-to-wear clothes, why, then he's going to talk about it.

If you ever wore a suit that didn't fit, you'll be in a frame of mind to appreciate these clothes of ours. These tin suits are the genuine values we ever had; come in brown or gray worsteds, black or gray clay worsteds, mixed or square cut. We know they can't be duplicated anywhere for less than $15.00. Money back if we're not right.

ONE PRICE.
