A GHASTLY SIGHT.

rice-cone was locked. He opened it and in the sitting-room—a sort of storeroom—there was an ax and a piece of a sort of tarpaulin. There were fresh bloodstains on both of them. On the wall there were bloodstains as if a hand had rested upon it.

Cross-examined by Judge Cherry—Witness said he did not remember having discussed with Sheriff McQueen, while on the way to Murray to arrest Thiede or when they got there, the subject of the probable murderer. Thiede was standing at his room door at the time of the attack as they came down the hill, but when they got up to the place he was behind the bar.

"Do you pretend to say that what you have already stated was the conversation which actually took place between the sheriff and Mr. Thiede?"

"I do state it."

"You swore he said that someone had cut him; they have killed my wife?"

"Herald someone ought my wife last night, and the sheriff answered 'Yes, and I believe you're the man that did it.'"

"Was there any further conversation at that time?"

"Not until Mr. Thiede passed around the bar, when Thiede said to the sheriff, 'You have no right to arrest me. That's the way to treat a man after sending for you. I have always been your friend, and now you come down and arrest me.' Thiede's wife was dead at the time. The sheriff said, I think, Mr. Cannon, has tied them."

"You didn't see the sheriff strike at Nick Thiede?"

Witness answered that he did not. Thiede spoke of two young Swedes having been at the place the night before and asked for drinks, and he believed he showed the sheriff where they lived in Bergetown.

"Wasn't Mr. Thiede moaning and crying and imploring the sheriff to go and see after the two Swedes and to investigate the matter?"

"He was a good deal excited and talked a good deal."

"Didn't he be crying?"

"Not at that time, but after he had been arrested and was taken away he wept."

"When did you first notice the spots of blood on the south door?"

"After the sheriff returned with Thiede from Bergetown that same morning. My attention was called to them by Dr. Ferrenbe."

The ax and piece of stick above referred to as having been found in a corner of the brewery were produced. It is were slightly bloodstained.

On the morning of Thiede's arrest, witness said, he found a knife under a mattress behind the bench counter, but there were no bloodstains upon it. That same knife was now in the sheriff's office.

"What, if anything, did the defendant say to you his wife said when he first found her lying cutout?" asked Judge Howat.

Witness—He said that when he went up to where the body lay she said "Oh, Charlie!"

The coffee clotting were for Thiede on the morning of the murder was brought into court and next introduced in evidence. Witness said there were then bloodstains on the red plaid handkerchief, on his shoes, drawers and other garments. Some of these stains were still visible. There was some blood on the linoleum that covered the south counter in the saloon. It was brought down and introduced in evidence at the preliminary hearing, but witness had not seen it since.

Deputy Marshal Archer was next called, but the defense objected to his testifying because he had been present in court a portion of the time during which Montgomery was giving his evidence. Mr. Archer stated that he was not aware of the court's order excluding witnesses, and hence Judge Hatch overruled the objection.

The witness then testified as to the bloodstains on the saloon door and elsewhere around the premises. The south counter linoleum was also stained, and had the appearance of a hand having been placed upon it. Deputy Sheriff Montgomery called witness's attention to the bloodstains on the ax and stick found in the brewery.
