BADLY DISEASED MEAT.

A Carcass Seeking with Tuberculosis Passed by the Inspector and Put on the Market.

Times have been a number of instances of late where diseased meat seeking the stamp of the inspector has found its way into the market, and for the benefit of the people who have into possession, it is to wish it were less of it. Two instances recently came to the shop of a single butcher. Both of them were carefully examined by a Deseret representative with the result that it was discovered that they had been in the market without the knowledge of officials employed by the city for the purpose of preventing just such an occurrence as this happening.

The last of these two instances is given herewith as it is the worst of the lot, and in condition it was one of the most unwholesome looking animals have detected the presence of tuberculosis. The inspector who discovered it attempted to condemn it, but the proprietor was filled with a passion and threatened to call with his lawyer and have the inspector arrested for interfering with his property. The inspector was firm in his decision, however, and the carcass was condemned and taken away.

The meat in question was that of a cow, and it was in a condition that even the most indifferent person would have detected the presence of tuberculosis. The lungs of the animal were in a terrible condition, and the inspector was filled with a passion. He discovered the cow with this in mind, and upon the first sight of the evidence of disease was called to the butcher's shop to inspect the carcass. The commissioner of health in the ordinance of the inspector has to anything but be a sinking.
