PROVO.

PROVO, UTAH, JAN. 10, 1894.

City Council.

L. S. Glazier tendered his resignation as chief of the fire department to the city council, and J. C. Wilkers was appointed to fill the vacancy.

The appointment of Jonathan Buckley as policeman was confirmed, and his salary was established at $50 per month. Several night watchmen were appointed special policemen without salary.

The matter of making some improvements in the city jail and fire department in the manner of heating, was referred to the appropriate committee.

Board of Education.

At last night's session of the board of education, the clerk submitted a financial statement for the year of 1893. The total receipts were $16,377.04; disbursements, $15,375.34; cash on hand January 2, 1893, $1,001.84. The reserves, aside from school property which is valued at $59,815.12, yet available during the present school year, from all sources, amount to $15,000.55. The present liabilities are $9,208.17, leaving a balance of $6,371.18. Under this financial showing the board will in all probability discontinue the schools for the year at the end of the third term, or perhaps at an earlier date.

Came to Blows.

John Homer, a carpenter, and Eugene Titus, an excellent saloon patron, engaged in a neat little fight yesterday afternoon at the Diamond saloon. The contest was brief and spirited, and resulted in a bloody nose for Titus and a decided victory for Homer. At the conclusion of the melee Homer picked up his false teeth, which had fallen out, and remarked that he would go and eat.

They Will Marry.

John H. Lee, aged 25, and Alice E. Elmore, 18, both of American Fork, are licensed to marry.

THE THIRD TIME.

John and Elsie had been engaged for a couple of years, and doubtly-minded they were well enough off in material affairs to have the knot tied for good.

So John built his cottage while Elsie was busied about curtains and linen, and all went merry as the marriage bell that was soon to ring.

The day before that set for the wedding John and Elsie went to their cottage with several friends to take a general survey. Their "home warming" was to be after the wedding and trip in the good old fashioned way. John had bought a beautiful sideboard for the little dining room, and as sideboards were not common furniture in the village this was caused much friendly comment and criticism. John had placed it at the side of the room.

"It would be so much prettier over here," said Elsie.

"Now, why?" questioned John.

"Well, it would shut more from the other room. And have a good light, too," she replied.

"But it would throw the room all out of proportion," said he. "The table goes here, and the stove there, and you see now how handiest we shall want it."

"I do not think so," retorted Elsie, although she did, and John looked at her in astonishment. "Just see from here how pretty it would look."

"Phew!" said John testily, "women never see but one thing at a time. The sideboard will stay where it is."

They had been engaged so long they did not have that fear of being misunderstood so characteristic of shorter acquaintance. Doubtless Elsie would not have thought again of his remark, but would have waited for opportunity to move the sideboard to suit herself and either convince him or be convinced herself, had not one of their female friends said smilingly:

"It's plain to see who is going to rule in this house!"

It rankled with Elsie. She was the one, she thought, who should have the say in such matters, and she longer she thought the worse it looked and the more tyrannical seemed her mate to be husband. It was too late to break the engagement, for every detail of the wedding was arranged for the next day.

So the morrow found a tearful bride, but to the gladness of his heart John never noticed her chastened and quietness. A bride is always expected to be tearful and solemn, and Elsie, with her white dress and veil and traditional orange blossoms, was an ideal bride and one of whom any man might well be proud.

John made his responses with hearty good will, and then the minister turned to Elsie and asked her the usual question.

"Shall" appeared from, and the minister started. He was slightly deaf and bending forward to assure himself he was not mistaken. "I did not mistake you, my dear," said the good old man.

"Shall" repeated Elsie in clear, ringing tones, and John's confusion was great.

He flushed and paled, then turned and walked deliberately out of the church, while Elsie smiled triumphantly in the crowd to keep a grief which at last shone. Her pride was gone, but, oh, how sorry she was!

It was the gossiping of the society. Nobody knew what had become of John, and Elsie staid closely at home. One day, but little weeks afterward, John came walking up to Elsie's door, and she flew out to meet him. He told her he had made his fortune in a mining venture, and he was home, and he came back to see if she would ever be his again and take the trip with him.

She said she would, and then timidly asked if she might move the sideboard when they came back. He told her certainly, and he would help her. It was not heavy for her to move alone. And just as the villagers were speculating from the amount of the unfinished wedding they received an invitation to see it repeated.

This time, nothing and nothing Elsie was just in the mine. It was a double trip. Slowly he was a little over two and half weeks. Elsie was married after her husband's return from a month's absence. When the good old minister asked him if he would take this woman to be his wedded wife, he answer was a resounding "Indeed!" The minister was taken aback, but he recovered John's answer was heard across the church yard.

"Well, now, the nothing will spoil things" said the good man in righteous wrath.

"Sausage" said John inconsolably, and he made out of doors, and whistled Elsie, thoroughly provoked, fell in a faint.

John went away again, and the months rolled up and up, until two years had passed, and he had never come back, for he had nobody, had been blue. Elsie had the key to the cottage, and she locked it with everything in it, for she moved the sideboard to her brand new.

At the end of two years John came back, and walking up to Elsie's door again. It was not she but expelled him all the time, although she had never allowed her self to think it.

"How do you do, Mr. John?" said she, but she didn't ask him in.

"Fairly well, Elsie, and as you see, I am," he answered, and there was a little twinkle in his blue eyes. "I guess we are about even, aren't we, Elsie?"

"I believe we are," she answered, but there was pain in her pretty brown eyes.

"I wish, though, we had got married the first time," he said gravely.

"So do I," Mr. John, I did wrong," and then she began to cry and hide the door open for him to come in.

They had a long talking day, and they both said "Yes" to everything, to very body's relief. The sideboard stayed in its old place, and they lived happily ever after. Nobody knew what they had private warning or long talked, was seen. Then Elsie wanted John to help her arrange it in her way.

"The room does look better with it so," she admitted, and Elsie was so happy and John so Elsie—Chicago News.

Made Wrong.

A man bought a box of quinine when he didn't need it the other day. He was sitting up in Mary street and smoking a cigar. Now, a light cigar isn't a pretty, any, one how large for a bit good, so with a little tad nothing backward before him. "I wish I could find some one to give my box to. Guess I'll go down to the bay, and then nobody was done—Sunday Mail.

BACK VOLUMES
—OF THE—
DESERET WEEKLY.

The sixth volume of the DESERET WEEKLY in the present form is now bound. A limited number of copies of these six volumes can be obtained at the DESERET NEWS Office, Salt Lake City, in bound form at $5.00 per volume. It is the best history of current events to be obtained, and by far the cheapest, and the time is not far distant when they will be eagerly sought after by students of history, anxious to be informed of the stirring events which have occupied within the past three years—the most interesting period of the history of the Latter-day Saints. Every person who can afford it should secure these volumes while they are to be had for future reference, and especially should they be obtained for every Sunday School, Improvement Association and Ward library. Apply early to avoid disappointment.
