WENT SOMEWHERE.

The Hon. Marcus A. Hanna was generally conceded to be one of the most promising men in his profession. His clear head, his character for hard work, his way from the most obscure poverty, against immense odds, made a combination that was rapidly becoming great with the promise of a reputation that would certainly soon be fame.

He was most fortunately married to the love of his youth, and her sweet, unselfish nature was the little Dot, beautiful as a dream, odd and old fashioned as the only child is wont to be, and holding in his chubby hands the reins that gently ruled the parental hearts. It was the honest joy of Mr. Hanna to be with his child, to listen to his weird and artless talk, and to hold the little form close in his arms. Whether sitting upon the cars or walking upon the street, whether toiling upon his task, to which he late retired, or raising down tears in the early morning before his day had awakened, his straying thoughts were of this child. He was supremely practical, and the solitary day dream into whose prismatic shades he suffered himself to wander was this castle in Spain in which his boy was prince and hero.

As he smoked his cigar at the club, while waiting for some idlesser friend to keep an appointment, he would look out as the great rumbling omnibus stopped and think how Sunshine would enjoy going through it with him, how he would show him the engine room and the sooty firemen, and then take him up the elevator so swiftly that it would make him catch his breath, and then let him see the wood carvers and engravers here and the lithographic machines there, and all the other wonderful things in the many offices, and then hold him up so that he could look over the railing for a story and see men down into the court at the tiny men and women crawling around ever so far beneath on the ground floor, and finally go to the roof and point out to him all the great city spread like a map before him. How big the little fellow's eyes would grow, and how happy he would clasp his father's hand!

When the police patrol wagon rolled through the street there would flash into his mind how he would take Sunshine to the police station, where are all the big officers in their uniforms—for policemen are desirable to all children.

When the fire bells rang, he would hastily, in his fancy, make a pilgrimage with the boy to the fire department station, for there every day at noon the men go through the drill and the wonderful horses come out and run into their harness.

When the great steamers whistled and their hoarse notes penetrated the counting room where he was sitting during the trial of a case, he would go on far excursions upon the water with his child, and they would have plenty of time to talk and play together. Yet the bystanders only saw a man apparently listening intently to the arguments of opposing counsel.

And space would fail me to tell of how many times in these bright visions he had gone to other grand places with Sunshine. The parks, the theaters, the museums, the delight of band shows, the parades, the steam railway trains, the ball games and a hundred other grand and strange things had Sunshine seen strolling through the vagaries of his father.

But his career pushed. In reality it was only a few minutes during the day that he could see the boy, and many, many days he was so busy that he could not see him at all. Sunshine never complained. Papa was working so hard! His father seemed proud of it, and so was he. But some day papa would take him somewhere. Once in a year, when the father had an evening at home, he would sit and talk with his child until at last the long curls were spread over the big breast of the man's vest and the blue eyes dimmed away into sleep. And during those talks they would arrange all about the expeditions they were going to make.

One day Mr. Hanna came home in high glee. His physician had positively ordered him off for a vacation. He had secured the tickets, and tomorrow he and mamma and Sunshine would go—go away up into the woods and fish and sail a boat and shoot guns and walk all around among the big trees. As he rode homeward he went over a dozen times all the delicious points that he would make when he told the boy about it. How the little hands would clap and the little feet would dance, and the child would, perhaps, throw his arms about him and say: "You old, sweet, sweet papa! I know you'll take me somewhere."

But his wife met him at the door with sobbed face.

"What's the matter, darling?" he cried. And a cold fear numbed his heart as he gasped, "Has anything happened to Sunshine?"

"Oh, Mark, Mark!" she said heavily, resting in his arms.

"Tell me quick! Please don't wait!"

"Oh, Mark! Our little boy has had a bad fall. He was playing on the back stairway. He slipped. He hurt himself so badly. The doctor is up there now."

With an incoherent cry, as that of a stricken beast, the father came to the bedside. The face was gray and a smile came upon the pale features. The little boy reached up his arms. The father bent down and the child sobbed him. The doctor laid the blessed form in the little ones. The child whispered into his father's ear:

"I love papa. I love—you—mamma—you're—so—good. You're going—to take—me—somewhere—aren't—you—papa?"

There was a long pause, and the hearts of all seemed to stand still, lest they should jar the fragile vessel and make it haste to spill the lingering last drops of life. Presently he whispered again:

"Papa?"

"Yes, Sunshine."

"We're—going—somewhere—aren't we—somewhere?"

The quivering arm relaxed and the little breath had ceased. There was no weeping there, for the wreck of life's hope made a grief too deep to find voice except by inter-stices—an agony too great to be expressed save by some statue of marble.—Frank Crane in New York Advertiser.

Bad to Pay For His Patriotism.

A passenger in a railway train from Germany to France recently said, "Viva la France!" as the train crossed the frontier. The German authorities argued that, though the remark was not made in Germany, it might very well have been heard in the next compartment, which was at the moment on German soil. So they fined the enthusiast 10 marks.—London World.

He Was Polite.

It was once told to a certain king of England that Lord Blank was his political subject. "I will test him," said the king and showed Lord Blank the royal carriage, holding the door for him to enter first, which he did. "You are right," said the king. "A lesser man would have declined me with ceremony."
