CONVICTED.

The train was due, but it had not arrived yet. Twelve of us waited in the station. Eleven o'clock at night was the time. The weather was goats and kittens that night.

"Haven't starved so often I was on the jury in the Frisbie murder case," said a short passenger in a pea jacket.

"Good thing for the defendant was to murder some one now," said a tall man with a bumper and some fishing tackle by way of luggage. "There's a jury that'll do it."

"No, there ain't," cried a big man in a big white overcoat. "Count me out—only 11 of you. Wouldn't set on a jury in a case of life and death. Wouldn't bring in a verdict of guilty if ten men had seen the deed done."

"Reckon you don't hold to capital punishment?" said the other.

"Don't believe any of the evidence," said white overcoat. "War, man alive, I might have been hung myself on the very best ——— there 20 years ago. I know what I'm worth."

"Yes, didn't do it, then?" asked a very little old man with no hair to speak of.

"You'd have sworn I did," said white overcoat, in tones offended by the question. "Six would. Nobody said Trial and Jacquith. I was a young fellow then, just 20—big for my age, horrible temper, sartorial fool.

"I liked the girls," said white overcoat. "Like 'em still. I was good looking, but Jacquith was handsomer and Tilly Sparks said so. Her mouth told me that she did, anyhow, and as I'd been paying attention to her it wasn't pleasant to lose that on the very night when Tilly went off to church with Jacquith.

"'It's a shame, Thomas,' said the sympathetic. 'I reckon for her it, but she laughed at me. 'Jacquith is 20 times handsomer than Tom,' says she. 'Wouldn't I like a change why shouldn't I now? Why? And that's the truth, Thomas.'

"'Well,' says I, 'no doubt it is, and girls are girls. Let Tilly do as she chooses. But as for Jacquith, I'll spoil his beauty for him.'

"With that I went off in a fury, meaning to thrash Jacquith next day. I took's a thought of cutting his throat, but I meant to give him two black eyes if I got the opportunity.

"Then was Norris in bed, home, sick with a cold. I roomed with him. He was a young man from Boston. All the good young men do come from there. He taught Sunday school and wanted to be a minister, only circumstances hadn't permitted.

"'I couldn't chase up eyes,' said Norris, 'if I'd talked like that. You've mentioned the evil one 14 times, and you've spoken of the lake of fire and brimstone 10 times. You've gone through the house and jiggered that Jacquith is composed of like an unusual work, and you've chased 'em all separately, and you've thrashed his father.

"'Hold your tongue,' yelled I. 'You ain't ordained yet. Nobody is compelled to hear you preach until you are. I'll talk as I choose.'

"'At this he tucked his raw colored hand under the sheet, and I put out the light and turned into my own bed, but I couldn't go to sleep I was in such a tremor of rage. I lay there thinking and thinking, as if I'd been a machine made to turn out thoughts by the bushel.

"I thought how gloriously I could give it to Jacquith. One, two, three—much! One, two, three—much! Down with him, and all that, you know. I thought I should like to break his nose and gouge his eyes and leave marks on him for good.

"After awhile I thought what I'd like to have a loaded pistol. Then I remembered that I had one. It didn't belong to me. I was keeping it for a friend. I had it in my bureau drawer.

"Norris hadn't called to me as I went out of the room, so I suppose he hadn't heard me; but there I was in the street, with the pistol in my breast pocket. It was not late yet—only 10. If Jacquin had been so greatly encouraged by Tilly, no doubt he was with her yet.

"I took my way toward that well remembered door. I stood behind the lamp-post on the corner and took a peep. My suspicions were correct. He had been in and was just bidding Tilly goodby. I saw him kiss her.

"And the door shut, and on he came toward me, whistling as if he'd swallowed a canary bird. And behind him, from under a porch where he'd been hiding, came a man—a great, rough brute of a fellow—creeping, creeping on his track.

"They were opposite my lamppost, and I saw the fellow draw a pistol from his pocket and take aim straight at Jaquith's head. I forgot all my own rage then.

"'My God! Jacquin, take care of yourself!' I cried.

"And there was the report of a pistol, and I saw him before me. But as his face—the murderer rushed down the street, and I knelt beside him. Blood streamed down his temples all over my clothes, all over my hands. 'Speak to me, Jacquin,' I cried. And then a hand came down on my shoulder, and I turned. A policeman stood there, and beside him stood Norris.

"'I knew where your angry passions would lead you,' said he, but in spite of my cold followed. I'm very sorry for you, Thomas.'

"No one believed my story of the man who had followed him, and there were witnesses—Norris and Tilly's cousin—to attest to the fact that I had threatened Jacquith's life. In fact, the evidence was all against me. They didn't seem to take ten minutes to decide on the verdict, 'Guilty.' Sentence of death was pronounced upon me by the judge in less time than I can tell you of it."

"Twin cousins," cried the station master. "Don't stop a minute."

"Good gracious!" screamed the little old man. "How did it end?"

"Convicted murderer," said the man with a white coat. "Sentenced to be hung next Friday. Gallows built. Clergyman with me. Letter to mother. Letter to Tilly. Black cap on head. Rope hanging on the platform. Crowd looking. Last dying speech—"

The engine shrieked.

"Passengers," yelled the voice at the door.

"What saved you?" screamed the little man.

"Woke up," said Thomas Thomas; "woke up then. Found myself in bed. Hadn't gone up at all. Pistol safe in the drawer. Norris snoring in the next bed. All a dream."

And the train was off.

"Never touched Jacquin," said the story teller over his shoulder. "He married Tilly. Goodby."—Exchange.

A COMPARISON.

Relative Merits of Plymouth Rocks and Silver Wyandottes.

A Missouri poultryman says in The Breeder's Gazette:

I have for years made a specialty of two breeds—Barred Plymouth Rocks and Silver Wyandottes—and for the first time in my life I have been able to give to each breed enough attention to get a pretty thorough idea as to their good and bad features.

It is not my aim to advertise my own stock. These two breeds are so well known and so extensively bred by the country people that a few words can hurt no one and may do some good. Now as to maturity, up to ten months old the males of the two varieties were so near alike that it was necessary to put them on the scales to detect any difference. The few ounces difference was in favor of the Plymouth Rocks, three Plymouth Rock cockerels weighing 6½ pounds at 8 weeks old, while three Wyandottes weighed 5 pounds and 12 ounces. In the females the Plymouth Rocks were away ahead, three of them weighing 5 pounds and 5 ounces, while the Wyandottes weighed but 3 pounds and 7 ounces. Both had the same care and were hatched at the same time and by the same hens. Now a word in regard to parents. Both the Wyandottes and Plymouth Rocks were from stock up to and in most cases over standard weight, so there was no advantage to either side so far as this is concerned. As a breeder, if only the males of the two breeds are to be used, there is virtually no difference in the two breeds, but if the females are to be used then the Plymouth Rocks are decidedly the best. At maturity a Wyandotte hen will seldom scale standard weight so near together that there is little or no difference.

As to their laying the Wyandottes lay a trifle smaller egg than the Plymouth Rocks, and they will not vary in eggs in a pen of ten hens if the same care is given to both breeds. The standard weight of the Wyandottes is almost a pound under the Plymouth Rocks, still it takes as long to mature one as the other, so if live weight as hens is any particular advantage then the Plymouth Rocks have the advantage again. But the Wyandottes, like the black horse in the race, come to the front with age, as a Wyandotte hen will keep pushing on weight until she is 4 or 5 years old, and is always tender and easy to cook, while a Plymouth Rock hen will get to a stagnation at 2 years of age and after that time is hard to cut, to say the least. As winter layers they are both good, and it is doubtful if there are two better breeds to the standard in this particular.

White Ducks Only.

A Pennsylvania correspondent of The Rural New Yorker writes: It ought to be impressed on the general farming public, or that part of it which raises ducks, that it should weed out all dark colored ducks and breed only from white ones. I don't care from what breed, or no breed at all, but they should be white, as they dress so much better. A white duck can be picked at any time, while a colored one will not pick off smooth until November. You can always command 1 to 3 cents per pound more for dressed white ducks. I have bought duck eggs on the market as they ran, and the larger proportion would be colored. I believe that I lost money on every one of them. I have also farmed a good many western ducks. The white ones paid a fair profit, but there was a loss on all the colored until after November. The colored ducks are not desirable. The shippers work them off by putting 10 or more in each coop of 50, and to be able to lay the whites we must accept a lot of miserable dark pinfeathers.

Your Baby

If we told you that some baby we knew grew fat and healthy on Scott's Emulsion you might not get enough to tell you about it. But if we told you that every baby we knew grew fat on Scott's Emulsion you would want to know the reason. Reason: Scott's Emulsion is the best food for babies when cows are dry or babies can't take mother's milk. Babies like it. Mothers like it because it agrees with them and does them good. Little ones use one, two and three bottles at a time for cough, cold, wasting, weakness or thinness. They thrive and grow on it.
