SHOPPING JUST ONCE.

A BUSINESS MAN [illegible] HIS WIFE FOR OF[illegible]

He Proved to Him Conclusively That Buying Things for the Family to Wear on New York Men Are Inclined to Regard It—It Was an Ordinary One Too.

A certain New York woman has a husband who made himself conspicuous recently by a remark. He was reading aloud to the newspaper the suggestion of some masculine nagging thought that it would be a good thing if women would try to think their shopping to savor the rare an hour earlier than the time the workers could shop, in which case the latter could have their sons in their newspapers without any mandamus probe from the sight of standing women about them. And reading this husband remarked explosively:

"That's a sensible notion. Women can just as well manage their shopping hours to be through and home by 5 o'clock."

His wife differing with equal emphasis, an argument followed which ended, as every argument in the husband's experience that he could do it, and he was no longer either. Whereupon his wife, by way of a peace offering, put on an ordinary walking suit, and in a week moment he accepted the invitation. A day that week he entered, and the husband duly returned to town after breakfast.

"We must start early," he said. "This is one of the joints I mean."

"Are you sure I can come start," replied his wife, and the head of the family waited to hear slip away while the wife got the children off to school, cleared with his mind about the day's meals, received an early visitor on an errand, saw the grocer's and butcher's men, wrote a note ordering coal, put on her jacket and bonnet, and finally left the house with him at five minutes before 10.

AN EARLY START.

At the gate his wife was met and detained five minutes by a poor woman who belonged in her dreary tenement district, whose call necessitated a return to the house for an order on treasurer of a relief committee. Their rendezvous in West One Hundred and Twenty-second street, and it took ten minutes to reach the L station. Six minutes more to catch a train, which they left at Eighteenth street and Sixth avenue at exactly seventeen minutes to 11 o'clock.

"Now take a transfer card," said the husband, "and get everything in one shop. That's the way you women waste time and strength running about to compare prices and some times and then."

His wife said nothing. It was her habit to use a transfer card.

The large shop first entered was crowded. It was not easy to get to the counter desired, but once there a clerk was ready. Some white goods were bought, and then some colored goods was asked for. Only two pieces were in stock, neither would answer; the strand must be done elsewhere. The previous was remedied on the transfer and the hosiery counter was sought. "Stockings for Ned, Fleanie and little Frank," said the wife; "two grades school and best." The hosiery counter is always besieged, and a considerable wait ensued before she could be served. Only one part of the order could be filled. Certain sizes were out.

A rug for the library, "which I am so glad you can help me to select," was her next errand. They took the elevator for the rug department and took seats for inspection of the stock. Rug after rug was spread before them until, as the husband confessed, "the choice became maddening." He liked every one better than the preceding, and finally gave it up.

THEY GET MORE LATE.

Then his wife priced, examined, considered the colorings of the room for which it was intended, and at last made a judicious selection, not, however, until a good half hour had been spent in the work.

One or two more purchases were made in the shop as expeditiously as possible, and a number were tried for but were not obtainable. There was a considerable wait at the transfer desk for parcels and bills not arrived there, and when they were once more in the street the husband was astonished to find that it lacked only a quarter to 1 o'clock. To get a luncheon place, to arrive and discuss the most convenient exterior hour and then the work was over that.

An exchange was to be effected at one shop which combat numerous circumstances, and at another the wife wanted to look up a parcel bought the previous week which had failed to reach home. In the time the dry goods set type became very tedious and the husband, like one of Guido's figures, seemed a little "under his soubrette." The colored plate process of color was nearly to process, the decent smoking room were not all turned at one place, other purchases needed time to be made than one stop, and it was 5:30 before they left their shopping place and boarded a Third avenue elevated train at Ninth street.

Both were tired and the husband especially so. "And," said the wife, "this is an easy day of shopping. I have bought no bonnet or gown; the cleaning of either requires more time and effort. You see how weary it is and how miserable the house mentioned. And I too an expert shopper, and I know what I know, and for I have not looked at a single thing outside of my list, which one has to do to keep half interested."

The truth is the smartest person on a car at night is the woman who has been doing a day's shopping. It is physical and moral. It exhausts the fatiguing nerve, yet it is so important a branch of the family affairs as any other part. And it seems will only let us alone when we choose our own time it is all we ask, and they may keep their ends forever."

The husband replied never a word.—Her Point of View in New York Times.

A Good Rule to Follow.

I trust that the day is not far distant when our women will realize that it lessens their dignity and self respect to wear fashions just because they happen to be a fashion of fashions and cheap. It is morally wrong. The time of bargains is discount upon all and children brought up in such an atmosphere cannot have true conceptions of taste or appreciation for the best things. "To dress, to go, and pay, to be true"—that they will be compelled to learn before of their fellows.

This is the second rule for the best you can afford, paying a good, fair, and honest price, and then take the best care of it. To stick to the same of economy after all—not what you paid for it, but what you care and take care of.—Margaret Ardmore Oldham in Kate Field's Washington.

The Chicago women health inspectors are demonstrating the usefulness of their office most to useful service. There are five of these women employed at a salary of $1,000 a year, and they spend most of their time in [illegible] their recommendations. They wear a badge of authority, a star, which is only conferred after a test of the education is necessary in sanitary sense. Their special duty is, of course, the inspection of the sanitary conditions of the dens where women and children are employed.

Wallace, of which to-day they [illegible] of times to go [illegible] parlor window [illegible] "Shakes," a boy [illegible] Tompson's [illegible] ver, and the matter was brought up [illegible] the town council, after many [illegible] for getting rid of said grass had been proposed and discussed it was agreed to put a jackass up there which should eat the grass.

And the jackass being procured and put upon the town, not without difficulty, remained there for the space of a day well contented, there being a sufficiency of grass. But early on the morning of the second day, after he had repeatedly called the attention of the inhabitants to what he felt would be the fact that there was no more grass, he endeavored to get down from the tower himself, in the doing of which he broke his neck, and the town council had to pay for him.

They tell, moreover, how a certain gardener of those that go around winding their cattle from the "Jamaica Dew" came into Sudbury once in these time, when there was much gardening in progress. And he stood and watched the game a while. And he heard how this man had won 300 head and how that man had lost 500 head, and so on. And he was much taken down and put himself a while, which he did. And he had shortly won over 1,000 head.

And he said he would play no more that day, and he inquired where he should go on the day following to receive the thousand head that he had won. And they told him to go in such a place. And he went there at the time appointed with several vagrants, supposing that he was to receive 1,000 head of cattle. But he received instead 1,000 head of cabbages. For Needless is famous for its cabbages, which they send to Jabipa and to the hot lands, and to all parts, so any man who has traveled that road knows well.

They tell of a barber who, in shaving common people, was wont to put his thumb in their mouths to bulge their cheeks out, but that in shaving those of the better class he used a small apple, which was kept from the cold by a string for the purpose, and one of his best customers entering one day to be shaved the barber put his thumb in his mouth, and the customer inquired for the apple, whereupon the barber told him that the hot man then had the apple in his mouth but meant to be the customer had to content himself with the barber's thumb.—City of Mexico Anglo-American.

What He Required.

"By the great guns, sir," said a stout man in an ulster and white necktie, looking down from the balcony starting the upholstery department of a well known dry goods store, "this is an immense place—huge, simply stupendous."

"Oh, yes; nice store," said the clerk obligingly.

"The Bon Marche isn't a comparison, No, sir; not a comparison, sir. How much of a stock do you carry?"

"About two hundred thousand dollars' worth."

"Good! First rate! And furniture—how about furniture?"

"Admirable! Take a house and go right through it, I suppose—furnish it complete, could you—from top to bottom, eh?"

"Yes; everything from carpets to bric-a-brac."

"And lace curtains and upholstery, you keep them?"

"Keep everything."

"And you know what style is too—Renaissance, Pompadour, Henry II and the Louis?"

"No one better posted than our manager. Perhaps you'd better see him. Mr. X——, here one moment," and the manager came up with a smile on him like a half moon.

"No idea of it," moved the sister. "No idea. Had an impression you had to go to Europe for such things. Good taste—everything correct—surprising really."

"If you could give me an idea," ventured the manager, "of about what you required, you know"——

"Ah, yes; I forgot. I want two and a half yards of green double fringe. Magnificent establishment!"—Upland store.

Fish Hatched in the Sky.

I observe a reference touching upon showers of fish, stating that science has not yet fully explained the phenomenon. Perhaps a scientist may be located. Several causes have been suggested. Might it not very probably be that fish and frogs which fall apparently from the skies are really bred there?

Water how, it is known, very frequently carry eggs of fish to a great distance, having swallowed them, and in their flight disgorging the ones not turned where they can and do fruitfully and mature in water over which those birds pass. The eggs of many sea fish are very glutinous, and readily adhere to subsidence brought in contact with them during particular times of their incubation.

Is it not very probable that not only do these birds convey one upon their wings or well as in their crops, and when flying at great heights the ova, becoming detached from the wings, may remain suspended in the rarer atmosphere, which is quite possible under certain conditions of atmospherical pressure, and that when under development they become too heavy, and naturally fall to the earth?—Nature's Realm.

Electric Storage Lamps.

A novel application of the electric light is in the equipment of dirigibles. Two lamps are on the outside of the carriage and one on the inside, each of three candle power, and all under the control of the coachman or the compass. The storage battery used is placed at the back part of the wagon body, and will run all the lamps for a period of six hours, the averaging cost only about ten cents.

Wheat Raising.

With a little care in seeding and in the management of the fire some thousands bushels may be saved. A pan of boiling vinegar in the room will counteract smut that is unknown.

Potatoes for Seed.

Potatoes to be used for seed require to special preparation. They should, of course, be sound and in a thoroughly healthy condition when taken out for planting, and the usual practice is to cut the tubers into about four pieces—that is, quartered—but some growers divide them even more, leaving not a sounding two or three eyes on each piece, dropping three or four pieces in each hill, or, if cultivated in rows, drop a piece every twelve to fifteen inches in the row. Dusting the freshly cut tubers with hardwood ashes or rolling them in plaster will usually prove beneficial, as it prevents the attacks of wireworms and adds something in the way of nourishment to the young plants.—American Agriculturist.

Overcome by Joy.

In 1869 Philip H. Gosse, afterward as well known as a writer upon natural history, and the father of Mr. Edmund Gosse, was in London in a state of downright poverty. He had just returned from Jamaica, and had but a few shillings in his pocket. He only immediate success was the manuscript of a book which a score of years later, in Uncle Tom's Hall, was had around a reputation as a naturalist, and offered to treat and pay twenty shillings. The publisher refused. Mr. Edmund Gosse's biography of his father.

The manuscript was "The Canadian Naturalist," and it pleased Mr. Hall so much that he offered to take it immediately to Mr. Van Voorst, the distinguished publisher of scientific works.

Philip Gosse's pride made him conceal his real state from Thomas Hall, and though the latter knew his cousin to be in need of employment, he did not suspect that he was in the direst straits.

Mr. Van Voorst appointed a day for the young author to call on him. Meanwhile the shillings, which he had taken to, were stolen, strangely enough, from the pocket of young man a day to a small eating house had to be abandoned, and instead of it a boarding was secured on credit, and he slept in the dingy attic in Farringdon street.

At last the day broke on which Mr. Van Voorst's money was to be given, and with as much of the gentleman about him as he could muster, the proud and starving author presented himself in Paternoster row. He was ushered in to the sanctum and met face to face Mr. Van Voorst.

He no longer had hope, and expected to be accompanied to be not again in the street, with his manuscript, and of course accepts his hands. The publisher began abruptly:

"If the year book, I shall be pleased to publish it. I will give you the guinea for it."

Once hundred guineas! It was Pure and full the fellow!

The question was so evident that the drawn and emaciated looking youth, glancing at Hall, passed to his feet in consolation. Gosse down slowly into his seat again, while Mr. Van Voorst, commenting, "My dear young man, my dear young man! Four guineas! Why, I should be hard and stubborn to know which it was toward the power of gods to amend my temper."
