MR. FOSS SUGGESTS.

His Plan to Relieve the Financial Distress of Nebraska Farmers.

The great drain that has come to our people by reason of the large amount of money, amounting to millions, that we have to pay out as interest upon the debts which the farmers owe and are obliged to pay keeps us poor. The unfavorable rate of interest eats the very life out of our farmers.

The time has come when the farmers of Nebraska should act as a class, when something substantial should be done, if possible, to relieve the producers of wealth of the great burden that rests upon them.

The plan I advocate is as follows: Suppose, by way of illustration, the farmers of Saline county are heavily in debt and are paying high interest and commissions. Supposing they join together, say 1,000 of them, and organize under the laws of the state as the Saline County Co-operative Farm and Loan association. The object of this association is the providing of security on which money can be borrowed at a low rate of interest. All the members own in fee simple and live upon the land upon which they wish to borrow money. All wish to borrow money; some to take up existing mortgages, and others to take up new loans. They have perfected their organization and chosen their officers. The titles to the farm lands are passed upon and appraisements of value made. This is done by a commission or board, of which three are the officers of the state appointed by the governor. [illegible]

SWEEPS THE COUNTRY IN 1892.

That Is What Two Observing Men Predict of the Farmers' Movement.

No inquiry is so often repeated in my ears as I meet the prominent politicians of the country in this city as "What of the Farmers' Alliance?" I find that this is the question which politicians are asking of each other, especially if they live in the west or south. The Alliance has not yet shaken the eastern politicians from their equilibrium. Some small [illegible] about the Alliance seems to [illegible] an unexpected eastern source.

I was talking with Ex-Congressman E. Moody Boynton, of Massachusetts, when he expressed the opinion that the Alliance would sweep the country in 1892. Mr. Boynton defeated Gen. Butler for congress in the seventies, and was afterward prominent in the greenback movement, being associated with Solon Chase, of Maine, in trying to plant the greenback doctrine in the land of steady habits. He is at present engaged in promoting his invention of what is known as the bicycle railroad. When he was asked to give reasons for his belief he said:

"The Farmers' Alliance is the outcrop of seed sown by the greenback agitation. It has taken up the money question, which is always popular, and has presented a scheme that is in some respects like the greenback proposition. Then it has taken the side of the farmer against the monopolist, and so paved the way for a union of agriculturists against all other vocations, and farmers against both the old parties. Now, I found my faith on what it will do in 1892 by what it has done in 1890. Kansas has been a Republican state so overwhelmingly that since the Republican party was organized no one has ever dreamed of its being carried by any other party. The Alliance came up in a day, so to speak, and carried it by a large majority. South Carolina has been a Democratic state with similarly overwhelming majority from time immemorial. Yet almost in a night the Alliance sprang into existence in that state and secured control of it, sending an Alliance man to the United States senate."

Donnelly on Watered Stocks.

Ignatius Donnelly, the newly elected president of the Minnesota Farmers' Alliance, said in his speech before the state convention:

"The 'Soo' claims that its road cost [illegible] [illegible]

The coming legislature should take steps to investigate this watered stock business, and should compel the prosecution and punishment of all engaged in it and the cancellation of all the stock. If it is a crime to steal a loaf of bread from one man, how much greater is the crime to steal the money that would buy that bread from the pockets of a million men? [illegible] of misery?

The Grange in Maine.

The report of the labor commissioner of Maine, just issued, contains the following concerning the state granges:

The state grange was formed in April, 1874, over sixteen years ago. The following statement gives a summary of the progress of the grange in the state since that period:
