EISTEDDFOD SQUABBLE.

Flurry Created Over the Disappearance of a Report.

Several Resignations of Officers Threatened—The $5,000 Gift Has Not Materialized.

It appears that there is a merry row on among the officers and members of the Denver Eisteddfod association, whose movements are so closely watched by Salt Lake and other Utah musical people. The Denver Republican of yesterday says:

There may be several resignations among the members of the Western Eisteddfod association, who have to charge the national convention of the association in this city next fall. In fact the resignation of Secretary Lloyd Jones is already in the hands of the assistant secretary of the association.

This condition of affairs has been brought about over the mislaying of a certain report which belonged to the lady board of managers. The report contained, among other things, a recommendation for the distribution of prizes which were to be offered to works of art and science. It was addressed to the board of directors and asked that an appropriation of $500 be set aside for this purpose.

The board of directors held a meeting on Tuesday last and acted upon the report. The request of the ladies for the appropriation was cheerfully granted, and that was all that was thought about the matter until yesterday morning, when the executive board of the ladies contingent of the association was scheduled to meet.

Owing to some misunderstanding among the ladies about the place of meeting there was not a quorum. Some of the ladies had gone to the Brown Palace and after waiting for some little time had concluded to go home, thinking that there was to be no meeting. Others went to the headquarters in the California building, where Mr. Jones' office is located and waited away the time. Finally the meeting was adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.

But in the meantime some of the ladies who were at the headquarters inquired of Mr. Jones for the report which they were to ratify and confirm. The secretary set about to hunt for the document. The most diligent search on his part failed to reveal the whereabouts of the missing papers. Then the cry went up, "Where is the report?" The secretary explained that he was not present at the last meeting of the board, being detained somewhere on business. He informed the ladies that Mr. Hughes, his assistant, had officiated in his place and that all the papers were afterwards turned over to him, but he was at a loss to know where the report had gone.

After the ladies had left it dawned that the rumor reached the ear of Mr. Jones that some of them had remarked that he was not performing the duties of his position of late for he would not have lost the report. This stung the secretary and he immediately sat down and penned a letter to the board of directors, stating that he desired to resign as secretary of the association. He placed the resignation in the care of Mr. Hughes and requested him to present it to the board at its next meeting on Thursday.

Mr. Hughes endeavored to argue with the secretary, but he retorted that he believed he was doing the proper thing. Other members went to the secretary as soon as they learned of his action and succeeded at him to recall his resignation for the sake of the association. It is quite probable and is seriously hoped that Mr. Jones will reconsider his action.

It has already been planned by some that should Mr. Jones resign they would select Mr. Hughes, the present assistant secretary, to fill the place. Mr. Hughes stated last evening that he would not accept the position under any condition, but on the contrary should Mr. Jones step down and out he would follow him. "And there are others who will follow me," added Mr. Hughes. "Mr. Jones has not violated his duties to the letter politic but on the other hand has been since the very life of the association so far. I sincerely hope and believe that he will recall his resignation which he has placed in my hands."

Some of the prominent Eisteddfod members were overheard to remark last evening, when commenting on the affair, that this was another case similar to one experienced by the board of management of the World's Columbian Exposition, with the woman's contingent of that gigantic and successful enterprise.

It was stated yesterday at Eisteddfod headquarters that there was no justification for the assertion made in a morning paper that John F. Campbell, of Louisville, had promised $5,000 to the Eisteddfod. While Mr. Campbell, like many other prominent men of the state, has expressed sympathy with the Eisteddfod association and given it his assistance that he will respond to a request, when called upon, he has in no way committed himself specifically on the subject of financial aid.

AMUSEMENTS.

James O'Neill's Monte Cristo—Hamlet Twelfer.

The Theater was filled in every corner last night, when James O'Neill presented his Monte Cristo, and that the humanity throng thoroughly enjoyed the popular play was evidenced by the frequent storms of applause and curtain calls that greeted the singers. As the curtain fell over the last scene, it was with apparent reluctance that the audience rose to leave the Theater. And no wonder, for Monte Cristo is one of Dumas's most fascinating novels; the dramatization, notwithstanding the liberties necessarily taken with the original, is excellent and the treatment it receives at the hands of Mr. O'Neill and his aide company is highly artistic. As compared to Villiaime, Monte Cristo takes hold of the popular mind with all the charm and power of fiction, while the tribune chiefly appeals to those who are able to review wholesome lessons from history. Plays like Monte Cristo, whatever their intrinsic value may be, will therefore always remain popular.

To say that O'Neill in the title role is as at ease to repeat what has been a to every where. Both as the injured, the author and the avenger of many wrongs he captivates the audience. Being, in fact, the creator of the character, his dramatic work in it is, so far, the recognized standard. But this fact has not prevented critics from pointing out, that the curious, jerky vein into which he drops when preparing to take the methods (and) of Dangers, is very peculiar. Mr. O'Neill, however, believes it to be justified by the circumstances. Monte Cristo, he says, was sure of victory. He loves Mercedes and is again the jolly sailor boy. But the answer to this argument is obvious. Only a few minutes before, Monte Cristo has acknowledged himself in error in assuming the office of an executor of divine justice; he accepts his present position as a just retribution on himself. It is conceivable that he might after wards, at the sight of the sunny, joyous influence with a burning desire to complete his work as an avenging angel, by dipping his sword in the heart blood of him who had wronged him, but it is not conceivable that his noble soul would permit him to do so in a spirit of levity. If Monte Cristo is not in earnest, terribly in earnest, he is no longer Monte Cristo.

There is, besides, a grave objection to the view Mr. O'Neill takes on this point. A sense of his own judgment can fall to make it a stage representation of killing, lawfully or unlawfully, in a manner that causes the boughtists to laugh and enjoy the picture must of necessity have a demoralizing influence, all the more condemnable because one tendency of the performance, and pray the heavens rather to grant those his spirit to comfort, counsel and bless them in the days of their affliction and sorrow.

FOUNDING THE KONGO STATE.

Explorer Stanley Tells in Brief the Story of the Great Enterprise.

During my descent of the Kongo I had revolved over and over in my mind the question of the destiny of the river. Seated at the prow of my boat, while let our bottle, and daily watching the river developing itself, I was preoccupied with these thoughts every leisure moment. There was, it seemed to me, no other power but England that could intrust itself with this part of Africa, and, as I said, there was not a single white man in possession of any portion of the equatorial belt except at the mouth of the Kongo, where a few traders had gathered. But despite the numerous addresses in England upon this subject I failed to awaken more than a geographical interest in equatorial Africa. The terror of the African climate in general was too strong upon every body.

Elsewhere, however, the reports of my addresses in the English newspapers were taking effect. After nearly nine months' busy life in England the king of the Belgians invited me to visit him, and I was then informed of his strong inclination to undertake for Africa what I had been so unsuccessfully urging Englishmen to do. He was closely president of the African International association, which was about to set on foot a humanitarian enterprise from the east coast, and he led me to understand that if I were free from other engagements he would like to employ me in opening the Kongo basin to European influence and civilization.

It was my opinion that the best way of setting about the work was to construct a light surface railway which should skirt the cataracts of the lower Kongo and then to launch steamers on the upper waters, which I estimated would furnish about 6,000 miles of navigation. We argued about this matter from August to December, 1878. The best Belgian engineers were consulted, but after the most elaborate calculations as to cost it was finally decided that as the expense would be great we should content ourselves with making wagon roads past the cataracts and build a series of military stations for the protection of caravans, and that the actual expenditure should not exceed $60,000.—Henry M. Stanley in Century.

OBITUARY.

JONATHAN JORDAN THOMAS MCCAND was born in the parish of Trefynnig, Denbighshire, North Wales, December 1, 1818. Parents, a descendant of a very old family of that name, who lived in Lewes in the same county. His early training by his father led him to be one of the most upright men, and a model of conscientious conversationalists of what is called refined society would naturally be. He was unalloyed by the pomp and fashion of city life. He was the master of many assets abstracted by the modern fanatics of his lofty home, and the grandeur of the starry heavens. Thus under the guiding hand of his illustrious father and his home he learned from the book of nature, he grew in knowledge and understanding, and developed talents of no mean order. He was a well-read in science, as well as general history.

Like other men of genius he excelled in some directions. He was specially gifted as a poet. His contributions to this class of literature were quite extensive. He was thoroughly conversant in all the rules that govern alliterative and symbolic composition to the three departments of the realm of the muses, the magistrate, diplomatic, vulgarian.

Much of his literary work is still in manuscript, which the surviving members of the family intend to compile and publish. He was ordained a Bard according to the ancient order of the Druids and had the bardic title "Nathan Ddu O'Lywen" conferred upon him. Wales he moved from Lewes to Trefnanti in 1847. He had by this time a wife prior to 1847. He had learned the weaver's trade and followed it for several years, but was constantly he was often interrupted in his business to calls from different social and trade societies to add them in their respective lines of occupation.

While on one of his tours to South Wales he providentially met with an assembly of people who were gathered to listen to the Elders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, but who were frequently interrupted by some in the congregation who manifested a boisterous and contentious spirit. As soon as it was known that Nathan Ddu was present loud calls were made for him to speak, which he did and by his calm and persuasive manner quieted the tumult and the Elders were permitted to continue the sermon without further molestation. Nathan Ddu was convinced at that time of the truth of the doctrine taught. Elders had preached in his hearing and without delay he embraced the Gospel as restored in this generation.

Later on he moved from Trefnanti to South Wales in the vicinity of Rhymni, where he became acquainted with Elder Daniel Powel and his wife Margaret and their family. In 1852 he married their daughter Mary, by whom he had four daughters. During the time he resided in his native land, he worked in the coal mines in different capacities and labored as an Elder and ministering in the several duties of his office until he emigrated with his family to Utah in 1863. Soon after his arrival he made his home in Mill Creek, Salt Lake county, until a few years ago, when he moved to Provo city, Utah county, where he remained until the time of his death, which took place January 1st of the present year, in the 80th year of his age.

The funeral services were held in the Third ward meeting house, which were conducted by Bishop William Lewis, who also addressed the assembly of mourners, as also did Elder John Jones. Both paid tributes of praise to the many excellent qualities of head and heart possessed by the departed.

At the close of the services the remains were borne to their final resting in Provo cemetery in the presence of the family and numerous friends.

WROTE "A GILDED GOD."

The Latest Interview With Mrs. E. Burke Collins.

Famous Novelist Recovered From Serious Prostration.

Paine's Celery Compound Made Her Vigorous and Energetic.

Dr. Mc ele has made Paine's celery familiar to every one. But not until the appearance of Mrs. E. Burke Collins' story of "A Gilded God" did some readers dream of the wealth of material under some gilded novelist's pen in the vicinity of the city of our own New Orleans.

In a round interview by a New Orleans paper she said: "Of course, in a novelist's life, there are ups and downs, from time to time, through more than one cause, but I feel that I owe my present good health to the use of a Western Physician. I am a large sufferer in take up a literary career. Success is attained only at the price of the most exhausting labor.

Although Mrs. Collins' writings can always look a labor of love, her such domestic moment appeared to tend but to have its effect on her nervous system.

At one time she found herself tired and out of sorts, but her enterprising work, the various nervous and hospitable of work, she was not a nervous prostrate. Her waning fire in the face. The general feeling up the fire system could so be felt. It also tried to Paine's celery compound. Today she is perfect in health, and whose apetite, busy as ever with her brain and pen, and grateful to Paine's celery compound for timely help when her need and weakness and despair seemed about to be found her and rest, for all in an every thing she was done.

"Your celery brain work, my dear, tell on your strength," said a friend to her. "Yes, you have no idea how much. I am so my own for some to be more a day," she replied. "I am careful to obey the laws of health, and I am never without a supply of Paine's celery compound. When I feel weak and nervous and there is a feeling in my brain or a sinking pain over the eyes, which warns me that my energy is flagging, I take a dose of the compound, and am strong and free from pain in a week. I never neglect such symptoms of sickness, and neglecting it early before I made the mistake of Paine's celery compound. Scarcely a day passes that I do not urge some friend to take it. For neuralgia, indigestion, nervous prostration and blood diseases, I am convinced that there is nothing like Paine's celery compound. I am not surprised that physicians use it in difficult cases."

Paine's celery compound is found to be supply the great need of sedentary people. Its extensive use by brain workers, both men and women, suffering from sleeplessness, indigestion or other effects of a deficient nerve force, shows its ability to feed tired, emaciated, nervous tissue. Nothing else has ever possessed anything like the power of Paine's celery compound to restore a healthy nervous tone to the entire body, and to thoroughly cleanse the blood. School teachers, professional men, newspaper men, ministers, public officials, men whose daily outlay of vitality, because of hard, trying, anxious work, is excessive, find renewed strength, both mind and nerve, and through their healthy action, of the entire body, in Paine's celery compound. It is also a dispels headaches, rheumatic pains, dyspepsia, heart trouble, general debility and languor, and all other warning signs of the grave mischief that comes from disordered nerves and impure blood.
