A READ ON GERONIMO.

Plainsman Moffitt's Encounters with the Chief.

A pale man and a Christian was pitching out the subjects of interest to his left while he ate his coffee and pie. Suddenly the talk on his face seemed to change to a diabolical grin, his blue eyes flashed fire, and he rose to his feet as if ready with a leap to shed the blood of a fellow creature. This homicidal desire was not the result of any sensary abnormality, but of studying hell-red, hate in memory of pull and despair, is last as true as life itself. The grim, wrinkled visage of the Apache, an exhibit of renegade Apaches, was the same which wrought the sudden change in the plainsman.

"That ugly face was visible across the stable of my life barrel a good many times one night," said the plainsman, and then, turning to the listener he added: "You and I some pretty near dying in the same place, and at the same time, although you didn't know about it."

The remark was remarked, dressed, as merely arrogant, but the listener felt and realized, as he believed that it did not signify. To stand face-to-face with a man who his life had a moment before been a stranger, to refresh the mind over many incidents, during the summer of 1886 Lester S. Moffitt, now a plainsman well-known, was rendered a freighting outfit from Albuquerque to a certain point on what was then a wild and at times dangerous trail, the end of which was the Pacific railroad. The camp was about 10 miles from Albuquerque, and something like seventy-five miles from Wingate, the nearest military station. The rails had not been laid, and the freighting business was carried on mainly for a number of men and teams. Passengers were sometimes carried, as well as freight, for most of the people who resided in the Rio Grande Valley were preferred to have company. In more of the dangerous places a band of renegade Apaches was in the habit of from time to time, and such companies were made almost every day at Fort Wingate. At this period it was a wild frontier that did not have its personal Indian scare, and the freighters belonging to that peculiar class of Westerners who never worried about it.

The day before the eight-horse teams were to start from Albuquerque a young man accompanied by a boy of about 16 years of age applied for employment to the railroad camp. In these days it was necessary for a man to have a pass to Gallup, a place not anything before he was allowed to the Territorial relations made necessary by the Indian troubles across the desert. The young man explained that he had the girl had eloped from Ohio and that he had a relative residing in Gallup, and if he could get work he had promised him employment. He additional that he had no money to pay for his passage, and the scheme of his relative was not one known to the freighters. On the whole, his story was not so convincing as it might have been, and the young man would have been refused peremptorily but it not been for the girl. To his current pleading she added heartrending tales of the danger of being killed by the Indians had been put before them in bloodcurdling narratives that they could listen to their desire to go, and so they were told they were welcome to passage, if they thought they could stand the hardships of a freighter's life.

The days were very hot, although the nights were cool. The first camp was made near the Rio Puerco, and the girl did her best to prove that she was grateful, and the way she helped the cook made him impressed to dance of the plain but substantial food. In certain environments it does not take people long to get acquainted, and the young man was known for the night everybody was calling the girl "Nellie," her first name. In course the novelty of the thing had worn off, and she was as home as though she were feeding the pigs and chickens on her mother's farm in the Buckeye State. Perhaps she was there, she made the kind of picture that is always appreciated by frontiers-men, and after the first week or four hours there was not a man in the camp who had not sought himself morning that an ordinary-looking chap like her husband could catch such a prize.

Meanwhile the caravan moved slowly across the parched plains, and if there were any thoughts of danger in the dame they were in connection with a dream of some dare-devil deed that would flake the door a hole in Nellie's eyes.

Forty miles from Albuquerque the first night camp was made. The men generally sat around the campfire listening to the stories, but with a few which did the narrators credit all tales of Indians and horse-thieves were told.

The night wrangler who watched the herd was at a late hour in the night. There were no rumors of Indians on the warpath, and at breakfast denied he had shown any fear. Just as the sun was dipping down the caravan came in sight of a green valley. Cottonwood trees could actually be seen, and as the eyes of the men fell on it they gave its yellow hue and merged into a green award. Down the valley two miles was a cluster of ranches belonging to a rancher engaged in the business of raising horses. A little way from the corral a bunch of gentle ponies filled their backs, and at the sight of the strangers came in sight. Near a spring of mountain water the freighters made their camp, and it was the merry-est evening ever when Nellie's songs attracted the owner of the ranch to the spot. Yarns were swapped, and after the campfire had gone to bed the Indian scare was discussed. The plainsman sitting around the fire puffing at their pipes were gonna to deny the fact that Geronimo's band was on the warpath. It was one thing they had heard so many times that it had grown tedious. The stockmen went back to his ranch, where a number of men, supposed to be about 20, with a few of their horses were waiting for his return.

The freighters had been holding an animated discussion as to the Indians left about horse or the right leader was the better runner. It was growing late when one of them, who had replenished the fire, pointed a red glare against the sky. It was plain that the Indians were burning the stockmen's buildings. He dropped the pot and threw a few buckets of water on the flames. All the magazine assurances of safety disappeared, and now before the plainsman signs of danger. A moonstruck was sent to tell the night herder to get the horses as far away from the camp as possible, lest by their whinny they should attract the Indians.

The glare of the flames grew frighter. The yels of the Indians could be heard plainly now. Sometimes the sheet, sharp crack of a Winchester rifle reached the ears of the freighters, but whether it was the signal of death for friend or for foe could not be guessed, the Geronimo's band had modern weapons. Several among the company fancied they heard the imploring screams of a woman's voice, but in those like the other noises are said to be treated. At length the suspense became almost intolerable.

One of the men started across the open space between the wagons and the bushes and pick his head to the one nearest the fire, the company to retire. Carefully and with the feeling that he was treading on the domain where death lurked, he made his way toward the burning embers.

While he yet fancied himself a quarter of a mile distant from the house he said. Amid pulsed his head through an opening in the bushes and saw dark figures flitting about. He was less than 200 yards away from the barnyard gate. Fifty yards away some Indians were guarding the horses of the others. The brute seemed frightened at the fearful work their masters were performing. Suddenly in a blinded horse that could not possibly be mistaken for a mayane of the plains, was the chief, who directed the movements of the Indians in the bloodhound. Amost instinctively, the freighter gradually brought the muzzle of his weapon round to bear on the savage chief.

The freighter's arm was steady and his aim was sure. With him there was no question of mercy. To guess the trigger, was to end the wretch's evil life. He thought of the thousands of miles he had traversed, of the days he spent in the Indian fear. Quietly he figured out the probable number of Indians he would be before death sent him.

Geronimo was sitting on his horse looking at one slight sight. The light from the burning cabin showed every expression of his features as plainly as in daylight. The freighter lay very ill, but he was cool, and he could see down the sights of the rifle barrel. The Indians were stripping the body of a member of the cabin's family, and the chief was sitting on a horse looking with frank amazement round his horse in front of Geronimo and said something to his companions, who laughed in his face. There was a general shout. In a flicker the Indians were on their horses and rushed away. The freighter lying in the bushes still clutched his gun at the chief and resolved him until he was out of sight. He said afterward that he felt that he had allowed the chance of killing Geronimo to pass by, but when he was in the Bible Ohio girl in the house which the Indians were rifling it most directly away from he was thankful that he had been able to hold himself in check and not only save the life of the chief, but to know that he had done a thing as an irresistible impulse. AND.

Before the freighters were fairly on their way the next morning a trooper, who was commanding the post, accosted them with a field glass, rode up and asked which way the Indians had gone. He said he had seen the party pass by, but it was a little closer than time. The trooper, whom the company had seen ride up to Geronimo had warned his child of time, and had rid-while escaped to the mountain fastnesses.

The bride soon recovered her spirits, but her husband was more popular in the grader's camp, as they went back to the ranch. Nellie's husband, However, for the majority of the law often drives men from doing what they believe to be their duty, and the Indians in a great deal safer at Omaha, than they would be in some parts of the West.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Dowager Empress of China.

China is in the hands of a strong, intelligent, and very old woman—the empress dowager. She is one of the most remarkable characters of the world. She ruled China for thirty years during the most difficult period of its history, permitted when foreign plans and methods were being introduced, and now is the sole arbiter of the scheme of reform drawing out the old. She ruled China well. Talk of her killing the emperor! Why shall it be? Nobody has not more devoted, loving, and affectionate child. She saw the young, and weak emperor home by factions, dragged hither and thither by the rival factions of the country and another, and she took again, at her worn, but strong hands, the reins of power. She still took them as she held them when in 1862 she sent the boy-king to four of the indistinct sun of the Chinese Empire to consider against her. He is a great person.—Chas. Denby and E. P. Allen, in the Engineering Magazine for December.

The Mariposa Canal.

The late Prince Consort once said with profound judgment: "Some do not divide continents, they unite them." The sea is the great highway which nature has provided for the service of humanity, the money by which products can be distributed and thus rendered universally serviceable.

But while seas unite, they are themselves divide. I hence the Suez canal, with its wealth of benefit to the families of mankind. Hence, too, will be the Panama canal, the necessity of which is one of the most pressing necessities of our own time.—a construction which is already progressing, and in respect of which more has been achieved than the vast majority of people even imagine—and which, indeed, that the practicability of the completion of the great inter-oceanic waterway has been demonstrated, actually proved by trial, and what the expenditure of money and of time required for completion can be, has been, forecast, and will be found to be, if not to be than absolute precision.—W. H. Hunter, in the Engineering Magazine for December.

Encouraging Words for Others.

I suffered extreme nervous exhaustion, which rendered me unable to work. My nerves seemed to be 'on edge' and I had much lassitude. I began taking Dr. Miles' Nervine and steadily improved and now am enjoying good health.
