SENATOR GORDON'S LECTURE.

Magnificent, Able and Eloquent Narration of the Last Days of the Confederacy.

Senator John B. Gordon was heard for the first time in Utah last night as a public speaker, by a fair sized, discriminating and highly appreciative audience. His subject was the Last Days of the Confederacy and it was handled in a most magnificent and masterly manner.

The lecture was preface by an interesting concert by the Sixteenth Infantry band and on the stage with the speaker were several of the local United States army officers, including General Pearson. The senator was introduced by Governor West and received a hearty welcome as he stepped lithely and gracefully to the front.

There was a pleasing prelude to the lecture, in which the speaker paid a glowing tribute to Utah. He was surprised at her manifold resources, prosperity and presents, and from the depths of his heart he did say, "All hail" to the new commonwealth as she was about to enter the sisterhood of states. It might be that Mexico, the dark brunette of the south, Canada, the beautiful blonde of the north, or some of the blands of the sea, would be annexed to the United States. But he thought more of Utah than he did of all of them combined, and he pledged himself that on his return to the Senate he would dwell in his power to give her assistance.

Then the senator proceeded to deal with his subject proper and for a little more than two hours held his audience wrapt in the profoundest attention. No synopsis of it would do him justice and none could even faintly portray the many beautiful passages of pathos and quoted Southern honor. Many fashioned illustrating nobility of heart, courage of convictions and love of country on the part of brave men and heroic women on either side of the great civil strife was related in words of burning eloquence. In speaking of the lost cause of the South he did not do so at the expense of the North. In paying glowing tributes to Lee and his devoted followers he did not forget Grant and the men of the North. Both sides fought for what they believed to be right. When the war was over one flag floated over a common country and common ties bound the people of that country together.

The soldiers of the North and the South were called as common sons of this greatest of all republics. The chivalry and valor of the North, the courage and patriotism of the South, proclaim that the Stars and Stripes shall remain the immortal standard of freedom and guardian of the rights of every true American. The Southerner has already clasped hands with his brother in the North, and all bitterness has melted away in the tears of a grand reunion. Old glory shall wave forever over a happy and a united people, and shall remain to the last the truest, noblest emblem of liberty in all the earth.

No other baking powder is half as good as Dr. Price's the most perfect made.

WORK OF INCENDIARIES.

Attempt to Burn Down the Residence of Fred Kent at Granger.

Saturday last at Granger the occupants of Mr. Fred Kent's frame house were awakened about midnight by the roaring and cracking of fire.

Miss Gerber, one of the occupants, on looking out saw the corner of the house in flames. She immediately awakened a neighbor, Robert Ross, who with several buckets of water extinguished the fire without any serious damage to the house.

It was certainly the work of incendiaries as the whole corner of the house from ground to roof was saturated with coal oil with part of a burned gunny sack near by. The occupants of the house came near being suffocated by the smoke. If it had not been for the great presence of mind of Miss Gerber the family would no doubt have been cremated.

Gleason Wins the Wager.

Tom McCoy brought forth his terror last night and the horse was subdued and successfully driven to a wagon by Prof. Gleason. The animal was not handled until after intermission, and although there had been considerable excelling work done up to that time with several other equine subjects interest did not reach its highest point until the McCoy steed was led down to the center of the ring. So "tricky" was the animal that the professor found it necessary to throw him in order to get the harness on. This he did, however, and to the interest from the time he commenced the horse trainer had the horse trotting around the ring, hitched to the wagon, to the satisfaction of McCoy, the three judges and the enthusiastic audience. It was a great feat of horsemanship and it only helps to cement still firmer the friendship now existing between the noted horse trainer and the people of this city. The professor exhibits again tonight and tomorrow night.

AFTER DUKES.

The Nineteenth Century Bicycled and Bloomered Sports Out in Great Numbers.

If there had been as many shots fired during the last sham battle at Camp Douglas as were discharged this morning in the sloughs and lakes west of town, Uncle Sam's store of ammunition would have been much wanted.

At break of day the fusillade began. Thoughts of riots, strikes, marching and even Kelly's army, rushed through the writer's mind as he heard the muffled reports from a thousand hoarse-throated, fire-belching shotguns. But a careful perusal of the calendar showed the fact that this was the first day of October and that the web-footed, argus-eyed, hungry duck hunters had gone abroad in the land while darkness yet covered it. And how the web-footed creatures fell! What a slaughter was there!

After the town clock had chimed four hundred chimes and tolled the hour of eight, there appeared upon the streets of Salt Lake a sight which would make the hunters of ancient times question the accuracy of their vision, and the ancestors of these local Nimrods been told in their day that the sportsmen of the nineteenth century would go out to the hunt on a two-wheeled conveyance of steel, propelled by the nether limbs of the riders they would have been astonished more than ever, but what would they do today if suddenly brought face to face with a bloomered, bicycled and shotgun-equipped "new woman," returning home several trophies of the field? Thus it is, however, and as the writer gazed upon the hunters he wondered which was the coming woman and which the going man. Doubtless the sportsmen and the sportswomen had their fun and as a consequence there will be a surcharged duck market for a few days.

No economy so helpful as that obtained by using Dr. Prices Baking Powder.
