GOOD IN POLITICS.

Much has been and can be said, and with full truth, concerning the evil effects of heated political campaigns upon the manners and morals of the community. At the same time the game of politics, no matter how hotly played, is not without many advantages and benefits. Its tendency is educational, for out of all the rubbish that is used there are always a few grains of shining truth to be extracted. It requires a certain degree of respectability and a large amount of responsibility; and these, when not offered and assumed, are sure to bring disaster sooner or later to those who ignore them. It demands a measure of thought on the part of the candidates and leaders, and reflection and action on the part of the followers. Moreover, it stirs up the community's blood as perhaps no other influence can; and just as the ceaseless rest and tumult of the waves keep the sea purer and fairer than the placid, stagnant slough, so the occasional activity and turmoil of politics keep patriotism on the alert and wakes citizenship from its all too common stupor. Politics as a business has many failies and shortcomings to answer for; but it is not all bad by any means.

ASTOR AND KEELEY.

A couple of days ago a dispatch announced that one of the Astors had bought a large block of stock in the Keeley Motor company, and since capitalists as a rule do not invest in anything likely to bring loss, the inference is that John Jacob Astor must have seen enough of the workings of Keeley's inventions to convince him that they are realities and not on a par with perpetual motion machines and similar products of an abnormal brain.

Keeley has spent the greatest part of his life in experiments with a force he thinks he has discovered, infinitely more powerful than electricity. In describing this element, he calls it "the soul of the sympathetic elements in which it manifests itself, and which until now has been locked up in their interstitial embrace;" which definition we take to mean that the supposed newly discovered force is to electricity, magnetism and gravity what the soul is to the body. "It is," he continues, "the leader of all triple streams, associated with the polar negative envelope of our planet and the one most sympathetically concordant to celestial radiation."

But little is to be gained by quotations of the language in which Keeley seeks to convey his ideas to the world, because he explores a field so different from all other fields of discovery that his descriptions become unintelligible as an apocalyptic book. Even scientists confess their ignorance as to the terms he employs when expialning his experiments and his philosophy. So much seems to be clear, however, that he thinks he has found a means to harness and enlist for the use of human industry the very force of nature by which the flowers are made to bloom, the light to shine and the planets to revolve in their orbits. "The ancients," he says, "were far better schooled in spiritual philosophy than are we of the present age. Their mythological records, in their symbolical meaning, prove this fact. They recognized this latent element as the very breath of the Almighty; the sympathetic outflow of the Trinity of force, the triple spiritual essence of God Himself. From them we learn that when God said, 'let there be light,' He liberated the latent celestial element that illuminates the world; that when He breathed into man the breath of life, He impregnated him with that latent sentiement that made him a living and moving being." In this way the discoverer claims to have found out the great fundamental law of nature, the very law of creation; and it is an interest in this discovery that has been transferred to one of America's wealthy capitalists.

There are, of course, many who take the view of Keeley that he is a crank who endeavors to cover up his mental and intellectual condition with unintelligible verbosity, but others, though few in number as far, take a different view. Keeley, they say, is a genius, one who under difficulties insurmountable by any one else, grapples with the problem of reducing to practical conditions a power that can be measured only by the energy of the planet itself.

Who can say that the onward progress of science will not lead to just this goal? Much of what was "impossible" a few years ago is commonplace today. It is about time for another Galileo, another Newton to open to the world new mysteries of nature. And when he comes, the world will certainly move, in spite of all assertions to the contrary.

THREE GREAT CRIMES.

Those who are opposed to capital punishment, and especially those who though not opposed to the penalty itself insist that it should not be pronounced upon a culprit convicted solely on circumstantial evidence, ought to utilize to the fullest extent the fact that the three greatest criminals now in the jails of the country are awaiting death after a trial in which nothing but circumstantial evidence was adduced against them. Holmes in Philadelphia, Durrant in San Francisco and Hayward in Minneapolis are shown to have been three of the vilest and most heartless monsters in the criminal history of America. Yet not one of them was caught red-handed, nor has in either case a witness been forthcoming who saw the murder committed. The chain of evidence against them was slowly forged link by link, and considerable time elapsed after the crime itself before the arrest was made. But the prosecution and the detectives were themselves surprised how rapidly the testimony accumulated after the right clue had once been obtained; and so complete and convincing has it all been that in the minds of those who have followed the three cases through, there is scarcely the possibility of a doubt that the jury's findings and the sentences pronounced are just.

The blood stills at the recital of the atrocious crimes for which these three inhuman wretches—each of them a man of education and intelligence—stand in the shadow of the gallows. There is absolutely no mitigating circumstance in either case; and whatever men may think of the modern enforcement of the old-time law—a life for a life—there will be no dispute that these three ought to be removed forever from contact with human kind and that the world will be better when they are out of it.

MORNING STAR IN DAYTIME.

"A Subscriber" writes from Glenmont Ranch, asking if it is a common occurrence for the morning star to be visible to the naked eye in the daytime until it neared the western horizon, as it has been for some time past. No; it is not a common occurrence. The morning star referred to is the planet Venus, concerning which there was some information given in the NEWS a few days ago, in connection with its unusual brightness. The planet regularly approaches comparatively close to the earth, and it is owing to this that it may be observed in the daytime, as noted. It is not always the case, however, that it is so easily seen in the daytime as on this occasion. About fifteen years ago, when the planet was in close proximity to the earth, its unusual brightness was the occasion of much curiosity and comment, as it could be seen in the midday sky with about the same clearness as this year.

BANK INSPECTION.

That an institution known as a subtreasury of the United States should need and should receive a thorough overhauling from the officials of the chief institution, is of course easy to understand. The method of doing this work, however, is not so well known. The fact is that once a year each subtreasury is subjected to a searching investigation from top to bottom, and all without previous warning. Of such establishments there are nine in the country, located respectively at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis and San Francisco. At any of these, some day, without the slightest warning, several experts from the treasury department at Washington will put in an appearance; one of them will hand a letter to the subtreasurer from the secretary of the treasury introducing bearer and companions as detailed to examine the institution. This presenting of credentials occurs just a little before close of business for the day. The experts sit there until the day is done and the money and books put back into the vault, and then the vault is locked by the sub-treasurer and sealed by the chief examiner. The next morning the examiner and sub-treasurer unlock the vault together and together give out the money and books. Then the examination begins. It may take a week. He is long or short, it is so conducted as not to interfere with business or attract the attention of persons coming in from outside to do business with the sub-treasury. When all is done an exact report is made of the condition in which everything was found.

In these day of speculation, temptation and frequent wrong-doing on the part of trusted bank-clerks, a high authority in the banking business, namely the Banker's Encyclopedia Monthly, suggests the adoption of this policy of inspection by the banks of the country generally. It would seem to be applicable not only to such institutions but also to all others where the handling of large sums of money is involved. It is a uniform system, and thus is deprived of any reproach, for no official need feel insulted by the examination. Moreover, it possesses the merit of being absolutely thorough and impartial, in that it proves a safeguard against robbery from within by placing a check as loss upon the president or cashier of the bank than upon the humblest clerk in the establishment. To a layman the scheme would appear to possess points of excellence entitling it to a fair trial everywhere.

A RUSSIAN Solomon has come to judgment. A judge in that empire being appealed to recently for aid to enable a creditor to bring a delinquent debtor to terms, summoned the latter before him. The defense of the debtor was that the debt was not yet due, his agreement having been to pay on St. Henry's day, which is unknown in the Russian calendar. The judge immediately ordered that the debt be paid on All Saints' day, which is the day of all the saints, whether in the calendar or not.

THE STATEMENT from two or three of the leading actors of the world that Chicago is the American city where Shakespeare is most appreciated, excites New York and Boston to lofty scorn. But the work of Ignatius Donnelly is well known in Chicago; he says Shakespeare's work was Bacon's; and everybody ought to know that whatever has the smack of bacon goes in Chicago every time.

TWO REPUBLICAN senators from Utah will give the party strength enough to organize the next Senate. Where so much depends upon their vote, it is important that Utah honor herself in sending the right kind of men.

THIS MAY be an "off-year" in politics, but next year will not be. A President and Vice President, as well as Congressmen everywhere, and legislatures and governors in most of the states, are to be elected.

THE WEATHER isn't as cold as might have been expected, considering the event of last Tuesday. The locality of getting hot because of defeat is a political attainment that is not without its benefits.

Many people who are bilious, nervous, dizzy, weak, little disheartened, make the mistake of using saline or other drastic purgatives. All that is needed is a mild dose of Ayer's Pills to restore the regular movement of the bowels, and nature will do the rest. They keep the system in perfect order.

"Turn the rascals out!"—the familiar party-cry—may be applied to microbes as well as to men. The germs of disease that lurk in the blood are "turned out" by Ayer's Sarsaparilla as effectually as the old postmasters are displaced by a new administration.
