SILVER EDUCATION.

While the silver convention being held in this city is doing a meritorious educational service in the line on behalf of the white metal, it may appear to be merely of the silver men to have as loud a field as their hearts can desire in that line. The sentiment in the East does not appear to be in the best to relate to East and consider what the Western men have to say, but as it is the interest of the people, business and industry alone, are concerned, the information is given to enlighten and the discussion of the money question. This is patently set out in the issue of Public Opinion (New York), which announces that "whether we will or not, the free coinage question is bound to claim a large share of our attention for some time to come." Commenting on the proposition to discuss the subject by a congressional committee and by arguments addressed to congress, it says:

That of the discussion arise in the country against free coinage, it will be reasonable material. It is truly a hopeful sign of the increasing intelligence and independence of the American people in dealing with political affairs, and the party press appears to begin to place any great degree of reliance upon party pledges and dogmas.

The journal quoted from further emphasizes the fact that the battle is already on; that the national party conventions that will assemble a little more than a year hence to adopt party platforms and nominate candidates for the presidency, will be merely an outlines for registering the decisions reached by the individual members of the respective parties between now and the time for selecting delegates to those conventions; and it suggests that it is highly important, therefore, that every one who makes pretension to any interest in the political, economic and social welfare of the American people—for the money question, like the tariff question, must be viewed in all three aspects, political, economic and social—should give much careful study and thought to the issue raised by the silver advocates.

From this expression of public sentiment it will be seen that the silver cause will be not half way by a great mass of people to rally effort to the standard have large hopes of its ultimate importance. They need but to have the field undisputed, but are justified in the anticipation that their arguments will be received to if they process upon purely educational lines, and above the subjugating influence of enthusiasm and partisanship. The silver convention says elevate the East, the East is preparing to listen to the education. The field is about ready for the harvest, and the labors of silver cranks are to need but fast, and plenty of them, to reap.
