HIS TASTE FOR BLUE.

In 1848, the palace in which the peror and empress now live would have been burned down by the mob had it not been labeled "property of the nation." It is, as palaces go, a small, plain house of stucceed brick—one which cuts a much less imposing figure than many mansions of retired merchants in England and America. I stands on the great avenue known as Unter-den Linden, and is opposite the university and the opera house. It was built for the emperor when he was only a prince, newly married, and liv-ing on a rather small income. He has never been willing to change this resi. dence for one in the old castle, for he has always liked to have a simple home where he could live without ceremon His palace has but few rooms, but it comfortable and full of objects of art and taste, articles for the most part connected with the emperor's eventful life. The entrance to Wilhelm's rooms is a hall decorated with ancient and modern arms of every kind and des-cription. The ground is covered with huge bears' and wolves' skins, and round the walls run brackets of wood on which are placed models of the soldiers of the different regiments, made of bronze, and not only painted in proper colors, but wearing their proper uniforms. The next is a receptionroom, and is called the blue salon, because there are in it many splendld lapis lazzuli vases, clocks, candelabra and other articles made from this, the favorite stone of the emperor. Nu-merous embroidered cushions, carpets, footstools, tidies, etc., are to be seen in this room, all presents from differ ent court ladies on his birthdays and at Christmas, and showing, most of them, the simple blue cornflower of his hun gry days in their patterns and color. The walls are hung with masterpieces, which the emperor himself has chosen at different German exhibitions. As I have said, the prevailing color is blue, and so well known is the emperor's leve of this color that ladies at the Prussian court often dress in it in order to attract his attention. Travelers who have visited Charlottebourg will perhaps remember the impression that the statue of Queen Louise produces when it is bathed in the flood of blue light that shines through the stainedglass window. A minister, and by no means the least powerful in his day, had, so it is said, nothing in his favor but a preference for blue color. The story, which dates back only a few years, is to the effect that Von Boetliche was chosen by the emperor to help Bismarck simply because he wore blue spectacles, but of course there is no truth in it.

HIS DAILY LIFE.

HUMAN FEATURES IN A GREAT MAN'S CAREER.

The following extracts taken from a letter written a lew months ago by Henry Haynie, the San Francisco Chronicle's Paris correspondent, will be read with interest at this time, as they give the reader a glimpse of the human features of the deceased monarch's life.

It is the custom for every Prussian prince at his tenth year to become a lieutenant in the army. In the case of the subject of this article, the time was anticipated by a few days. Then, in order to caim the impatience of her little ones, the queen sang one of those old songs, the refrains of which make children laugh when they are crying. A wheat field was close at hand, and she sent the two oldest boys into it to gather some of the blue corn flowers, and with these she made wreaths for the long hair of those little blonde heads, and which was tied up behind in courtly queues. The sons of that good queen never forgot this scene, and the blue flower of the wheat field has ever remained the emblem mest loved by the present monarch.

SERING HIS ADVISERS. Since the different attempts on his ife, the police have been very careful that the kindness of the emperor should not be abused by wicked in-truders, but his majesty has never inked to be protected by police meas-ures. During the forenoon different ministers and officials and army officers are received in audience in order to make the reports, etc. The emperor is a very old man, but he still takes the greatest interest in all political and military matters, and he is anxious to learn the true public opinion about all important questions. He has a special secretary who reads all the papers and who cuts from them the interesting articles which he lays before the em who cuts from them the interesting articles, which he lays before the emperor, who is thus enabled to keep track of the news of the day and to "make up his mind" without the intervention of his ministers. It is a well known fact that the ministers have very often a hard struggle to induce his majesty to change his views, and they sometimes are obliged to yield to him when he believes that the cabinet measure proposed would be igainst the welfare of state. But when it is found that the measures in questi is found that the measures in ques-tion are necessary and for the public welfare, then the emperor is not selfish and yields to ministerial advice. The and yields to ministerial advice. The whole forenoon is thus occupied, excepting on those days when troops have to be reviewed or when the winter shooting parties take him into the provinces. Precisely at one o'close, the emperor takes his place at one of the windows in order to watch the march past of those troops which have to go out on guard near the palace and castle. A great crowd is always assembled in the Unter-den-Linden, and frequently welcome their sovereign's appearance with Isud cheers. When the westher is fine the emperor likes to drive out in an open carriage drawn by two black horses. Formerly he was alone Ia this Thiergarten excursion, but now he is accompanied by an aidde camp. The police know the way which his carriage will take, and shortly before the emperor leaves the palace two roundsmen and two detectives patrol the road. When the Grand Duches of Baden, his only daughter, stays with her parents in Berlin, she afways rides with her father, to whom she is very lovingly devoted. The grand duchess was thus driving with the emperor when the miserable Hodel made his assassin attempt, and the wonderful fortitude and bravery which were violated by the haughty wonderful fortitude and bravery which is assassin attempt, and the wonderful fortitude and bravery which were violated by the haughty in a perfectly honest and belleving spirit; but he is also enough of a philosopher to understand the opinions and feelings of all free-thinking men.
