B. Y. A. SUMMER SCHOOL.

Session Held in Rock Canyon, Tuesday Evening.

PROVO, Aug. 7.—The trip so previously planned in honor of Dr. Hinsdale, was to the mountains almost due east of Provo, the entire summer school being included in the invitation. The camp was reached through a narrow defile canons, and well named, "Rock Canyon." Conveyances of various descriptions were procured to transport the guests to the mouth of this gorge, where everything that went on wheels stopped, and those who were not provided with horses to ride, walked. By six o'clock more than a hundred persons had assembled. They were met by an usher, Brother Austin, who escorted women, men and horses through the quarter of an acre reserved for a kitchen, and where the tents were pitched. The guests were greeted and welcomed by Principal Cluff, and the horses taken to the elysian pastures beyond by their owners. The guests were shown the mound where the barbecue was in progress, and warned to return from the orchards of nature, whither most of them betook themselves, to dine on the uncovering.

This modern Arcadia is located some five miles from Provo, with an elevation of 5,740 feet, nearly circular in form, shut in by gigantic peaks and crags whose upper slopes and lofty summits seem to be solid stone. A spring of water, clear as crystal, and cool and pure as snow, gushes out of the ground near the tents, and the area of level land is a grove. The lower slopes of the mountains are covered with berry bushes and heavily laden with ripe fruit, locally known as "service" berries, but whose scientific name is "amelanchier canadensis." They have yet another name. When brought from the East with the shrubs sold in our gardens fruit growers, they are called "June" berries. This is a case, however, where the name does not matter; the berries were delicious, and to their abundance there was no end.

At 6:30 Dr. Hinsdale and wife arrived in a farm wagon drawn by four stout horses. This was the signal for supper. Many willing hands made light work of spreading a deep carpet of pine boughs, then heavy quilts, covered with snowy linen, to serve as tables, and the unpacking of baskets and hampers filled with the good things of earth, brought from town as a contribution to the feast. The cheerful hum of voices, the ringing peals of silvery laughter and the ever mingling and shifting of the bright hues of hats and dresses lent color and animation to a scene for which nature had done so much. The sun set early, going down behind an uplifted cross dark with new timber to its crest. The declining light swept the eastern crags with broad streamers of flaming light, mine dark upon their edges. The face of the cliffs was bright with the smile of heaven, the serene brightness of an assured and glorious consummation of all, and the mountains seemed to stand with bared heads to receive the benediction of the sun. Many a face turned wistfully and misty a heart swelled with holy emotions, the lips did not speak, in the presence of this display of nature in one of her grandest moods.

Now came the uncovering of the barbecue. In presence of many guests, including Dr. Hinsdale, the mound of earth was carefully scraped away, the heavy swathing of cloth removed and the meat, delicious, savory, was taken from its bed of hot stones and aromatic herbs.

Supper was announced and Principal Cluff looked after the comfort of his guests with the most considerate care. When all were seated, Prof. J. B. Keeur offered an appropriate grace, and the meal was proceeded with, in the most joyous spirit. A small table under a cowery was provided for Dr. Hinsdale and his wife and those who had them company, as it was not thought proper to give the Dr. an overdose of coughing in all at once.

By the time the supper table was cleared, the little vehicles of strangers were being drawn one by one between us and the departing glories of the sun. The students seated themselves in a compact semicircle, and a huge bonfire whose center was a living tree, was lighted, and banners of flame streamed out into the darkness, seeming forth a welcome light, and also welcome warmth. Against a star spangled, purple sky, was outlined the mighty wale of the mountains, in the center of the valley the wonderful school.

Prof. Giles led in singing: Oh, ye Mountains High. Prof. Brownell offered an impressive and appropriate prayer.

Principal Cluff announced that Dr. Hinsdale would continue his lecture, and the gentleman arose and addressed his pupils. He said in substance that he should take up the thread of his lecture where he had laid it down in the afternoon at the Academy, but believed his remarks would be in manner even being as educational. He called attention to the conditions under which the class had met, and repeated a few lines of William Cullen Bryant's magnificent poem: The Groves were God's First Temples. He enlarged upon the thought, in the school houses and colleges man first provided by nature. How primeval man had looked upon the limitless ocean, the grandeur of mountains, the plains, the sand, the trees and rocks, and then turned his face upward to the ceiler of heaven and found in the works of nature, fresh from the hand of God, the stimuli that formed his mental character. Man was the only living being which might thus look up who in face turned toward the abode of God. Great was the value of the facts of nature that lie right along the path of life. Those teachers were the first who taught their pupils to know the books of nature, that did not stand as unnecessary to the barren symbols of books. These are of little value unless first the facts and forces of nature a sufficient store of knowledge is drawn from the book of nature. Facts valuable. He referred to a group of persons, evidently a professor and his class, who were gathered specimens by the way, with the air of unsatisfied seeking to know all their pleasurable. Facts in first hand. Knowledge self gathered is far appreciated as it would be as one of the wonders of creation. He called attention to the magnificent spectacle of the day, its forces and growing work; many of its aspects were infinitely more interesting than words could be made. The Greeks divided knowledge into the sciences, empirical and philosophical—the first, the knowledge of a fact as a simple fact, as we would say, that is a fire and inquire no further; the philosophical inquires into its cause, nature and result. Both these classes of knowledge may be drawn in rich abundance from nature at first hand; stones, leaves, flowers, trees, stars and an infinite variety of objects are provided at hand. Nature has two aspects, the scientific and the poetical. The first deals with cold facts, exact measurements and weights, positive characteristics. The other is the poetical. It creates, develops and strengthens the spiritual. It wakens the emotions, nourishes sentiment. If a pupil should tell him that he or she did not understand the political aspect of nature, it would be equal to pleading guilty to a great poverty of all the finer sentiments and better attributes of the human being. He commended the study of nature from the poetic side, learning stories of beauty, streams of delight, and mental illumination. Make very earnestly of the great and peculiar advantages the students before him possessed over the dwellers of the flat, monotonous plain country, of the children of the crowded cities; had blessed been hers and reared on a farm, knew some of its hardships, and a great many of its advantages of such a life. 'Twas there he had learned the varieties of weeds, plants and flowers; their uses and differences; the homes and habits of birds, their times of nesting, and the peculiar rule of each; the tiny living things that crept upon the earth. Had gone into the woods and helped make sugar from the sap of the hard maple. Considered it the best part of his education. Hoped to be able to impress those farmers's teachers with the grand opportunities spread around them by the lavish hand of nature.

Had just a few words further to say. Had been here but a few days, had learned much, more perhaps than he had as yet communicated. Had been interested and impressed by a thousand things. Was not a Salaraz, but spoke on all occasions the words of truth and soberness. He desired to thank Principal Cluff and those who had acted him to giving him the delightful experience of the evening. He wound to these remarks the sentiments of Mrs. Hinsdale, and wished he to move a vote of thanks to Prof. Cluff, at least he could do so from his heart.

Mr. and Mrs. Giles sang: "When the mists have cleared away." Mr. Frank Giles played a guitar solo.

As the hour was somewhat late, and most of the company proposed returning home to sleep, Oh Country was sung by the company and horses were saddled and by twos and threes, and in merry groups, the revelers set out on the downward road to the place where the wagons had been left.

Quite a number, among them Dr. Hinsdale and wife, remained all night to breathe the odors of the Wasatch.

PROVO, Wednesday, Aug. 8.—Opening exercises at 9:45. As neither Prof. Cluff nor Dr. Hinsdale had arrived from the canyon, where they spent the night, class exercises were proceeded with and the lecture postponed till 2 p.m., too late for the day's mail.

NOTES.

A slight accident on the return to Provo this morning prevented the doctor from reaching the academy in time for the morning lecture. He was limping slightly.

While riding in the canyon yesterday, Mr. J. B. Waller, who had a wagon load of ladies, including three newspaper reporters, pointed out a curious fact with regard to the grasshoppers. They are damaging the forage crops to some extent and it seems that they begin at the bottom of the plant, eat off the leaves until near the top and then die. It remains for some scientist to supply the causes for this unreasonable and unprecedented act.

One newspaper reporter said after viewing the cache where the sheep was being barbecued: "What, only one sheep? Evidently Prof. Cluff is not so well acquainted with the gigantic appetites of his pupils as he is with their mental capacity. Why, I thought there would be at least two sheep and an ox!" This reporter accompanied the botanists last week, and drew conclusions from what there transpired.

Three young ladies tested the gallantry of a Provo boy very successfully yesterday. They were waiting up the canyon and saw a boy approaching on horseback. One of the ladies proposed a mock faint, when the other two were to assist the man of his horse to convey her to camp. All went well except, perhaps, a border raid that the young lady had intended, and the request for assistance was made in imploring notes, while the young lady reclined in the arms of her companions with closed eyes. The boy stopped, looked at her critically a moment and said: "I guess she ain't fainted very bad," and rode away.

AN OPINION GIVEN.

Recently Mr. J. D. Thomas, of North Dakota, visited the Shenandoah Valley, Virginia, and after carefully examining the country located in Winchester, he writes to Mr. V. Hutchards, Land and Immigration Agent, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Baltimore, Maryland, as follows: "I have been in nearly every state and territory of the United States, and am frank in my opinion that this valley surpasses all other sections in the Union. The lands are low in price, and produce profitable crops. I thank you for directing me here, and solicit those seeking pleasant and profitable homes to locate in this country."

A LIFE INSURANCE SUIT.

Plaintiffs are the Executors Under the Will of the Late Bolivar Roberts.

In the Third district court, suit has been commenced by George A. Lowe et al., executors of the will of Bolivar Roberts, against the Mutual Reserve Fund Life association. The complaint sets forth that the late Bolivar Roberts, as a member of the association, was issued a policy of life insurance for $10,000 in favor of his wife and children, same to be paid within ninety days after the death of said Bolivar Roberts; that all dues were paid on same up to March 1, 1893, and that said Bolivar Roberts had an arrangement with the Union National bank, of Salt Lake City, to pay all mortuary assessments, whether or not Mr. Roberts had funds at his credit in the bank; that the defendant without notice and without the knowledge of Mr. Roberts changed the place of said collection and the next mortuary assessment, to wit, for April, 1893, was not paid by reason of said change; that afterwards the said Bolivar Roberts paid the assessment for April and said deceased received the same with the knowledge that the same was not paid within the terms of said policy and that the defendant also received the mortuary assessment up to and including the mortuary assessment of August, 1893; that the said Bolivar Roberts died on August 15, 1893, and that the defendant has refused to pay the amount of the policy, wherefore judgment is demanded for $2,500, one-fourth of the amount of the policy, alleged to be due the executors, the other three-fourths being collectable by the guardians of the minor heirs.

In another suit plaintiffs sue the same defendants to recover $5,000 on an insurance policy, payable to Bolivar Roberts Jr., it being all the death of Bolivar Roberts. The facts set up are identical with those given above.

A NEW WAGON BRAKE.

It is Simple, Automatic and Effective in Its Operations.

There was brought to the News last evening for exhibition a newly patented wagon brake, the invention of Mr. Giles Bowler, a resident of Layton, Davis county. Today a reporter had the privilege of making a brief study of a blue print model of the same and unless he is very much mistaken the brake is destined to go into extensive use throughout this country and elsewhere.

It is so constructed that it can without difficulty be attached to the running gears of any kind of a wagon. It is absolutely automatic and it works by spiral springs attached to the double tree and at no time requires action on the part of the driver of the team. On a down grade the remarkably light pressure of five pounds releases the brake twenty pounds and vice versa. The instant the wagon starts down an inclined road so that the team has no pulling to do then the brake will apply itself according to the needs of the occasion. Then at the slightest lightening of the traces the brake releases.

The invention is one that has already attracted a considerable amount of attention and the model with its explanatory article has appeared in the Scientific American. Mr. John Dewsnup, of Deseret, has purchased a half interest in the invention and is assisting in getting it on to the market. At present it can be seen at the Bulmer baker wagon shop on State street and later at the Territorial Fair, where the company propose to exhibit it.
