Peculiar Geological Formation in El Dorado Canyon, Nev.

A REMARKABLE BLIND BRUGHNT.

For Complaint of a Handsome Young Woman—A Big Cave Struck, Etc.

The people of Colorado Springs are working with great energy to secure an auditorium at a cost of $10,000.

On Monday Jordan Rogers, a cattleman living near Ojo Hot Springs, Rio Arriba county, N. M., shot and killed J. M. Holloman, who was running a ranch on shares near Rogers's place. The killing was the result of an old feud between the parties, each of whom made serious charges against the other. Rogers had obtained three indictments against Holloman in Rio Arriba county, twice which were for carrying deadly weapons in violation of the deadly weapon act. Each side has its partisans and it is feared that other killings will follow.

H. L. Hover of Fourteenth avenue and Broadway, Denver, has invented what he calls the combined shield and guard for ladies' bicycles. The inventor thus describes it: It is a saucer-shaped piece of metal, with flexible body reaching as high as the waist, when attached to the wheel, the pet is extending downward on either side a little below the pedals. It can be fastened from 10 to eight inches, aluminum, leather or paper mache; is light, durable and readily attached to any style of wheel. A plant for its manufacture will at once be established.

A handsome young woman spent some time at the government building on Monday, says the Denver News, trying to identify in the crowd of men collecting their pay, a deputy marshal who she claimed seduced her during the short stay of the armed forces in Pueblo. She was well dressed and seemingly intelligent. The woman appeared to be very simple minded, as she told the story of her seduction to a number of persons. She was advised to go and get out a warrant, but refused, on the ground that she thought the man would marry her according to promise if she could find him.

George Bibb has struck a big cave on the Fairview mine, on Mullan mountain, Colo. The shaft is down 70 feet and on Monday the miners struck into a cave. Next day they went 230 feet through the cave, heard a rush of water from some underground stream, but the connection between the chambers are too small to allow either prospecting further at present. With some blasting they expect to go on far again. The ground is a series of chambers some thirty feet high. In other places there is a narrow causeway. The owners claim that when they can thoroughly explore the cave they expect to strike a body of mineral.

Says the Carson (Nevada) News: H. M. Beatty brought here and delivered to J. H. Dennis about eighteen inches of the bottom portion of a cane which is a relic of the Eureka fire in the late seventies. The cane was lying longitudinally on a lookout in Mr. Beatty's law office, and it was consumed with the books up to the place where the fire was extinguished in the building. But the cane has a far more interesting history than that. It was formerly owned and carried by John Hancock, the first signer of the Declaration of Independence. The relic has been in Mr. Dennis's family for nearly a century, and the major, who was named for the illustrious patriot, inherited it by will from his father, who came into possession of it also by will request from an older member of the family.

Wm. J. Garrison, the blind druggist of Wyandotte, is a man who excites great admiration, says the Detroit (Mich.) Telegraph. He was born and grew up in Vassar, Mich., and came to Wyandotte about two years ago. When about two years of age he lost his eyesight and cannot remember that he ever saw. Besides being a pharmacist he is a piano tuner and realizes a good income from his work in that capacity. In the store Garrison is very quick to serve his patrons, although he never gives out poisons. He can tell any brand of cigar in the case as soon as he hand touches the box. No man in the city is quicker or more accurate than he at making change. He claims to keep the most exact time in town. Mr. Garrison does all of his own trading, and the clerk who can deceive him in the quality at a piece of cloth or of any provender in the market must be pretty smooth. His ability to get along as well as those who have all their senses is a continual marvel to all who know him.

In El Dorado canyon, near Como mining district there is said to be a peculiar geological formation. It is a range of sedimentary rocks sandwiched between mountains of plutonic rocks of various kinds. The sedimentary formation appears to be of immense depth, and on its sides are the mountains composed of rocks of a volcanic character. This formation begins in the plain down toward the Carson river, and, entering the mouth of the canyon, extends up in near its head, a distance of several miles. In places along the canyon, says the Territorial Enterprise are seen rocks that present the appearance of wharves, and on these are piled great heaps of small rocks resembling sacks of grain or flour. The early miners named these "The Wharves" at first sight, as they resembled the wharves seen along the Mississippi. In other places in the sedimentary formations are caverns of considerable size, and in one place a large natural arch or bridge. It does not stand across the channel of the canyon, however, but at some height on one of its banks. All along the canyon the rocks are curiously cut and carved in the shape of animals and various natural objects. Various Comstockers expended a vast deal of money in the hope of finding a good coal mine at this point. However, the enterprise proved a failure. The deeper they went the less coal was found. Their shaft presently reached the remains of an ancient forest, or probably an immense pile of driftwood. The trunks of some of the trees were of huge dimensions. When they ceased operations, at the depth of 850 feet, they were in the trunk of a tree that covered the whole bottom of their shaft. How big it was they did not know, as they never saw either side of it. No such trees are now seen in Nevada as they found.
