Chinamen Can Come by Rowboat, a Lawyer Thinks.

UTICA, N. Y., March 20.—In the trial of James A. Miller, alias Jacob Mathison, for smuggling Chinamen into this country, now in progress before the United States District Judge Coxe, of Third States District Judge Coxe, of this city, Attorney Deangley, who was assigned to defend the prisoner, raised an interesting point today. The Chinamen came to this country by a rowboat across the Niagara River. The statute provides that it is a misdemeanor to aid or abet a Chinese person to enter the United States by land, or to aid or abet any such to land from a vessel. Deangley argued, and the government admitted, that a rowboat was not a vessel within the meaning of the statute. Deangley argued that coming by a rowboat could not be construed to mean coming by land. The effect of this construction would enable Chinamen to come to this country by rowboats. The court held for the present, that he would hold the statute broad enough to cover coming to this country by whatever means, but promised to give the question further consideration and change his ruling if wrong.

Entirely Burned.

MT. JOHNSON, March 20.—The Kennard Grocery Company was entirely burned last night. Loss, $110,000, partly insured.

A Butcher Butchered.

LINCOLN, Neb., March 20.—William Windnagel, proprietor of a meat market, was found dead in his place of business this morning, with his throat cut. His wife discovered the body, and saw William Kyle, a former partner of Windnagel, running out doors. Kyle has been arrested, but asserts that Windnagel committed suicide. The two had trouble recently and Kyle chased Windnagel with a butcher knife.

Persian Deposition.

LONDON, March 20.—Malcolm Kahn, ex-Persian Ambassador here, who was recently deprived by the Shah of his titles and honors, has written a letter to the Times, in which he refers to the deposition of Persia, and says it is a fact that the highest Ministers of Persia, while believing they possessed the confidence of the Sovereign, often perished suddenly. He further declares that when he publishes correspondence which has taken place between himself and the Shah and the Persian Government, even his (Malcolm Kahn's) enemies will recognize that his only fault has been that he tried "perhaps too courageously to modify the peculiar regime which has too often darkened the history of the present administration."

India's Finances.

CALCUTTA, March 20.—The financial statement of the Indian government for 1891, issued today, shows a surplus of 118,000 rupees. The famine insurance fund has been reduced to the original amount, £1,500,000. Exchange is taken at 1½d. It is proposed to sell £15,000 in council bills and raise a loan of £2,000,000.

RAILWAY TRAVELING IN RUSSIA.

The railway stations in these great cities are upon the outskirts, far away from the central hotels, and it is always a long drive to them. The railways are of broad gauge, with first, second and third-class carriages, with sleeping cars of the "Mann builder" style and great wood-burning locomotives. The wood burned in these locomotives is light pine and birch, and the cinders are very dangerous to the trains. We stopped once to put out a fire caused by a huge lump of burning coal from the smoke-stack of the engine, and the baggage of some of our traveling companions was badly burned by a fire which consumed the whole baggage van and delayed the train between Moscow and Warsaw.

The officials are attentive and obliging, but the spirit of enterprise and progress is absent from the direction. A single officer of the government, or a railway manager often travels in a specially reserved carriage, while the other passengers are uncomfortably crowded, and the suggestion of adding another car to the train is treated as an absurdity. The Russian carries his bed and blanket with him upon long railway journey, and as we enter the station at St. Petersburg it looked like the wharf of an emigrant steamer on the day of sailing. Pillows and blankets and feather beds and far coats and rugs lay in great heaps on the tables and chairs, and when the doors were opened to the train it seemed like moving day on the first of May in old times in New York. The train moved slowly through the suburbs, and gradually the city sunk out of sight even as it does when sailing away from the land. At last the domes of the Novski monastery and the golden pinnacle of the Admiralty and the fortress were all that remained. These too disappeared and we were out upon the steppe.

The train moved smoothly on at the rate of about 25 miles an hour through the solemn foliage of the fir trees and the shimmering leaves and white bodies of the birch trees. Now and then a cleared space showed the huts and hamlets of the peasants, rude dwellings of logs with a roof of boards or thatch and with a single window. They are the poorest kind of shels, and have no evidence of care and cultivation about them. Within there is only a picture of St. Nicholas with a little lamp burning before it, and a few coarse and clumsy articles of furniture. These miserable huts contrast sadly with the decent wooden railway stations, each with its brilliant little garden of flowers. At every mile or two along the railway there stands a man or woman with a green or yellow staff, which is presented as the train passes, and at the stations the porters present arms or assume a military position as the train enters or leaves. There are numerous stations with excellent buffets, often elaborately constructed with dishes of caviare, raw herrings, sardines, salted cucumbers and cold viands as a foundation, and bottles of wine labeled to suit the taste of the traveler, but all looking much alike, while in the middle, like a monument or some rare the samovar of shining brass, beneath which a lamp burns and keeps the water hot for the tea which Russians crave even more than water. In one corner of every railway restaurant is the gilded iconostas with the picture of a saint or of the virgin staring out into the blue tobacco smoke which fills the room. Before it hangs a burning lamp, and sometimes there is a candle-stand and lighted tapers in front. Every Russian takes off his hat to the icon when he comes in, and often when he goes out. The icon is free in shops and houses everywhere, and you can offer no greater disrespect to the owner of either, than to omit this obeisance to the icon. Although there are accident insurance agencies at each large railway station in Russia, the common people seem to prefer to put themselves under the protection of one of these saints. We saw many buy a candle for the saint but not one purchased an insurance ticket. On the platforms in front of the large railway building at the principal stopping places, there are usually a large number of off-duty men. The conscritos wear long, enormous boots, round caps of fur, closed coats of black cloth, and baggy trousers. Many soldiers and silver coins and trimmings adorn their coats. The gendarmes, who are always on hand with their red caps trimmed with black astrakan fur and surmounted by whitehorse cockades, are a feature in all public places. At some stations there are the peasants who sell for several hours crowds of knives are seen, all, with the small boys, wearing long boots; the women dressed in red cotton skirts with pink sashes, their sandy hair smoothed and braided, and tucked in rolls after wearing gaycolored handkerchiefs on the heads, and with them multitudes of healthy, fat and moon-faced children.

That Tired Feeling

is experienced by almost everyone at this season, and many people resort to Hood's Sarsaparilla to drive away the languor and exhaustion. The blood, below with impurities which have been accumulating for months, moves sluggishly through the veins, the mind fails to think quickly, and the body is cold slower to respond.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is just what is needed. Read what is said by Mrs. O. Fernside, 242 Bridge Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.: "I take Hood's Sarsaparilla as a spring tonic, and I recommend it to all who have this miserable tired feeling."

"For years I was sick and suffering, but last year took Hood's Sarsaparilla in February and have not seen a sick day since." G. W. Gunn, Milton, Mass.
