

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

"There is no friendship, no love, like that of the father for the child."

A father and the skating rink, and thereby hangs a sad story.

Some one says, "it is astonishing to consider the different degrees of care that descend from the parent to the young, so far as is absolutely necessary for the leaving a posterity." Some seem to bring the poor innocents into the world, and then think of them no further; the Infants' Home can furnish sufficient proof of this, anyway. Some raise children to maturity, and often not even to maturity, and then let them shift for themselves. Others govern their children with a love so violent, as to drive them away from home, and to haunts of shame and disgrace.

In family affection we rather look for protection against all the temptations of the world, but not that particular protection that fills the juvenile court and the reform school. Over on the west side of town, in one of the remote additions, a fond parent with violent love, for his family, sits at home, or rather sits in his miserable little cage for a home, cruel, harsh, dictating what shall or shall not be done beneath his roof, while his poor bent wife goes out to clean and scrub by the day; while his daughters seek employment in other parents' homes, and pleasure at that particularly attractive haunt for servant-girls, the skating rink.

Agnes was 15 years old, and a good and willing worker. At least so said this poor, bent mother, as she sought to place her girl in a good home. This mother did not mention, however, the fact that the girl was out on a certain probation—attached by an invisible string to the juvenile court. Of course she was anxious to give the girl a chance and a fresh start in a respectable home. What mother would not be anxious to do this, even though it meant unfair silence as to the girl's past? But murder will out, and today the girl is in hiding, and it came about in this way.

On the second night of her sojourn in the home where she was employed, Agnes went out, and came not home at all, until 6 o'clock the following morning. Her excuse? As she had a very heavy cold, her mother had prevailed on her remaining home that night. Two nights later, or rather two mornings later, she again arrived in the cold gray dawn of the morning. Under direct fire that day, Agnes made the following statement:

"My father is so strict, he will not allow me to leave home for a short time even in the day time. He keeps me penned up until I am like a caged animal, and when I have a chance to work out, I simply make up for lost time."

"But where do you go?" "To the skating rink down at the fair grounds. I can't dance, I can't afford the shows, so I go to the rink. I get in with a set of girls, not bad, just wild, and we get to fooling about until after the last car goes, and then I am obliged to walk home."

"Alone?" "Yes, alone." "Through that depot district?" "Yes, oh, I am not afraid. I'm not afraid of anything since father. If I can stand him, I can stand anything." Agnes made all sorts of promises to reform, but alas!

"I am going to try to remain home after this; give me another chance."

Another chance! Agnes remained home that night. But the next? The lack of the family were no sooner turned from the supper table, than the girl was out of the house, returning not that night, nor in fact the next day.

Meanwhile that father sat in state at home, grim and stern. It was Saturday afternoon, and the poor bent mother was baking and scrubbing and mending for the little ones, after her week's toil from home.

"Is Agnes here?" asked a caller at the door. "Why, no; Agnes is working for a nice family on — street," answered the mother, not recognizing the caller, never having known her except by "phone."

"She is supposed to be working for me," said the caller, "but I've not seen her since early last evening."

"Why? where on earth is she?" "That is what I've come to find out. I thought she might be here, and if not, then you ought to know she is not with me."

"What's that?" Father was coming to. The story repeated, the man put on his hat and rushed from the house. The poor bent mother called to him to wait, but to no purpose. "He's gone for a policeman," called the mother, "that's the kind of a father he is. No wonder she's wild when he lets her loose. He gives her no liberty, and when I finally prevail on him trying her at work again—well, she forgets, poor child. He could win her back with love if he only would, but he won't. He is a cruel father, and he beats the children; can you blame them for running away? He seems to delight in pushing them into disgrace, and then — cannot tell him he hands them over to the law."

He'll not sleep a night till Agnes, his own flesh and blood, is in the reform school."

"Where do you think she could be, today?" "I've no idea. You may have to appear in the juvenile court, lady, and if you do, speak as good a word as you can for my girl. She is not a bad girl—just wild from being caged." This was many days ago, and the girl is still in the silence.

A group of young girls stood on the corner in the vicinity of the skating rink. It was long after midnight. All were smoking.

A household was disturbed the other night, or rather the other morning, by queer and stealthy noises on and about the back porch. Burglars, no doubt. A number of the more courageous grooped about in the dark, listening, peering out of windows, catching their breaths, and waiting. At last, one was brave enough to make the kitchen and open the back door, and there—sleep—the help. A mere child in years. She had lost her key, and her way, and possibly her character. She was afraid to make herself known on returning, lest she be discharged. This was between 4 and 5 in the morning. She found her key next day. Strange to say it was down at the skating rink. LADY BABBIT.
