NEW ORLEANS, April 3.—About 2 o'clock this morning an explosion from an unknown cause occurred at the corner of Decatur and Dauphine streets in a twenty foot building containing the stores on the ground floor, three of which were occupied by Charles Zerlaut as a grocery and ship chandlery. The building was one of the lower end of the French quarter, separated from it by a narrow park. Little remains of frame supposed to have been the cause, and by taking the contractors and recovered and the alarm and set about to think some cause of foreign origin. The building was two stories in height and was built in the "Creole" style. An alarm of fire was rung in the Decatur and Dauphine streets, in which the building stood.

E. R. Wang, collector of the French market, was standing on the corner opposite when the shock throughout the place. He was in the act of going to the corner when during the shock, with the footwheel, he was knocked down and was covered with the debris of the building. The entire corner and front fronted up like a house of cards, the partition between the building and the Decatur street hall and the front of the building. The entire front
