CONDUCTOR'S NARROW ESCAPE.

Benoit Pratt Receives an Electric Shock on the Salt Lake Street Railroad.

An accident that came near costing Mr. Pratt his life happened to Benoit C. Pratt, a conductor on the Salt Lake City railroad, and son of James Pratt, the "Mormon" night watchman, whom other are without meaning crowing. Young Pratt was standing on the ground north street car, which runs to Fort Douglas. He was reaching from the ground to pick up the money and was leaning over the car platform with one or more of the passengers. When between sixth and seventh East Pratt was engaged in giving change to the passengers, and in doing so he had to lean over the car platform and his hand came in contact with a wire that carried from 500 to 700 volts. He was caught by a young man, named Charles W. Wolfe and held on to a rail, all the while remaining in an unconscious condition. He received no injury except a slight burn where he was shocked and to be sure he is the young man commended to review. Today he is recovering from the effects of the shock and will be up and around again within a few days. Benoit is thought to have received fatal shock, but he was saved due to that after receiving the shock he did not fall forward, instead of falling backward, as he unquestionably would have done had he been on the car which.

DR. TALMAGE ON SUCCESS.

Success and Failure was the subject of an address delivered by Dr. Talmage before a crowded congregation in the Tabernacle last evening. Some last evening. For an hour the doctor held the great assemblage in profound attention and admiration. As the occasion was made so high an encomium, the subject of failure was given more consideration.

After defining what that necessarily implied that it meant to show a failure, and that many a man goes to his grave with the world ringing in his ears that he was a failure, the "successful man," he, speaking of moral failure, said:

"I pity the man who has never failed, for he has never tried. He knows not the sweet satisfaction of success. He has never felt the exhilaration of victory. He has never strung his bow and drawn the arrow to the mark, though he may have strung his lip to many every week of failure. Every moment of the length of a whole life of failure, which consists in the attempt, and the effort, and the aspiration, or participation in the great contest of life, which is the only thing worth living for, and which will be the only thing worth dying for, and which will be the only thing worth remembering in the great hereafter, I tell you, I say, I say, I say, many of God's kingdom, yes, will be those who have failed in the effort to perfect the plan.

"Failure is necessary. Come to find out that that path of life I have we must pass through failure. Failure is the mother and success is the child. Success is the good child, and failure is the bad child. Success is the child that we love and we pay good attention to. We think that most of what we do is called failure and most of what is now called failure will be called success.

"I was thinking of one of my friends, and that that I will say, the most man who ever failed in Europe, and I will say, "It is the most successful man in Europe." When he was a student of the ministry, he was called to preach, and he went to the pulpit and he failed. He was called to preach a second time, and he failed.
