By the fall of a derrick in the Hotchkiss Pacific mine, quartzite, at Dorris, near San Bernardino, Cal., on Saturday, a German named William Wall was instantly killed. The derrick was supported by a heavy timber, which was loosened by a blast and fell, one of the beams striking Wall. His chest was crushed and his skull fractured, killing him almost instantly.

Paul Wellendorff, a teamster, was instantly killed near Morgan's ranch, Trinity Center, Cal., Saturday morning. His death was caused by the explosion of black powder. Wellendorff had two freight wagons, four horses and a load of merchandise. The front of the wagon was loaded with barrels and ten kegs of black powder. It is supposed that some powder leaked out and, coming against the iron work of the wagon, was exploded by friction. Wellendorff was killed, when the horses, and the wagon demolished. He was a young man 30 years old.

Conrad Nelson, keeper of a saloon at Canby, Oregon, was shot and probably fatally wounded by robbers in his place of business on Thursday night. As Nelson was closing up his saloon he heard a knock on the door, and upon opening it was confronted by two masked men, who covered him with revolvers and ordered him to throw up his hands. Instead of complying with the demand, Nelson ran through an inner door, and was in the act of closing it upon the robbers when one of them fired through the panel, the ball passing through his body near the heart. The residents then fled. Nelson's wound is considered fatal.

News comes from Pioneer, Nevada, of the death of William Zirk Saturday afternoon. The men had just gone to work on the afternoon shift and were working at an incline on the Zirk-Shultz mine, which was started in the morning. A large boulder obstructed the work, and it was the plan to dig the earth from beneath it, let it fall and then roll it out. Zirk was superintending the work, and finally got down into the pit, took a pick and went to work himself at loosening the rock. He had barely commenced when, with a crash, the boulder and earth fell on him, crushing the life out of him instantly, leaving only his head showing from beneath the stone. Workmen were at once to remove it, and not to wait until help could be secured from surrounding mines. Zirk's body was finally extricated.

J. Morletta, a Japanese porter employed in San Francisco, was crushed to death in a frightful manner Saturday morning. The morning supplies had been dumped as usual upon the sidewalk, and it was Morletta's duty to run the elevator down and up the elevator, which he every day twenty-two heavy iron counters in the sidewalk. It was the porter's custom to get upon the elevator and start it, and to place the doors open with his shoulder, the elevator ascended. By some way the doors stuck fast and the unfortunate Japanese, unable to stop the elevator or to get off from it, was caught between the doors and the foot of the elevator, in a vise and his life crushed out. Frank Williams, who was with him, ran to the nearest telephone and reversed the power and the elevator descended, releasing the porter, but when he was taken out he was unhurt.
