John Burns, the Labor Leader.

The Idler is an odd magazine to contain a sketch of one of the busiest men living, yet in that British monthly Mr. Blatchwatt describes a visit to the home of John Burns, the labor leader. Burns has helped to organize more than 100 trade unions and been connected with "something like 40 strikes." He lives in a picturesque rose-covered cottage at Battersea on the Thames, southwest of London. If he is as Mr. Blatchwatt represents him, then John Burns, the labor leader, is one of the greatest as well as most fascinating personalities of his time.

His work as a member of the London county council requires tireless clerical tasks, attention to statistics and business details. "It is work that I hate," said Burns. "I was made for a fighter, to lead a forlorn hope, to face a battalion of police. However, my greatest victory in life has been the conquest of myself." The old story once more and ever. He who can entirely control himself can control all mankind and prevail against the powers of darkness. Burns' policy in the council and everywhere else is "a standing protest against imperial supremacy in foreign and domestic affairs." He wants to give to the British colonies the civilization that Greece and Rome gave to theirs, without the subjugation that accompanied it.

Burns is a born enthusiast. He loves art and poetry and all things beautiful. His ideal government is "a republic wherein throne and aristocracy, church and class, will have forever melted into nothingness." No wonder John Burns can move a nation. Read how he gained his knowledge.

Those books were bought with scores of meals. Mazlock's "Is Life Worth Living?" represents a favorite book in my mind as to whether it should be the book or a pair of boots, and the book won the day. Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" I dug up in the midst of an African war. My greatest treat, after a meagre meal, was to read Gibbon's "Rome in Decline," and Roch's "Labor and Life of the People."

A great string of visitors poured in while Mr. Blatchwatt sat by. He seems scarcely able to find words to express his admiration of how the labor member of the London county council managed them all. "It was a striking and impressive sight, the perfect confidence and love of all these people, the cheery, sympathetic manner, the keen insight of the judge advocate general himself." But the wonderful, magnetic personality of the man is greatest of all.

He is at home everywhere and with everyone. I have not this in the palace of the right Hon. Rosebery, and I know he was as thoroughly at ease as he was in the following day with a number of young artisans in a church in Bermondsey. He introduced the vicar, he listened to him, he deferred to him, he differed from him, he humbly attempted over him, and on the following day he accompanied the whole group of men to the young Thieves and Leaghues by whom he was surprised, and delighted as he talked on intimate acquaintance with the gaieties of the contained, the works of the old masters, the brilliant achievements of the law.

I have seen him on the top of a bus, fraternizing with the driver and the conductor, learning their troubles, advising them how best to do, or wanted to do in every emergency, which, for his wonderful disorganizations, I had good reason to know he might have been the vice chairman and drawing an income which, in his simple ideas, would have been a veritable fortune. And I have watched him at work with his wife on a menial allotment in Battersea, or neatly taking the wicket of some skilled batsman, or holding his own with the best in a seven being match. As Lord Hugh Cecil, Tinker is "The Mikado" he is a rival of whom even the Gee himself need not be ashamed, while as a singer of music hall songs, he always brings down the house. "I used to act at amateur entertainments once in a time," he sang (all), "to my friends and the labor union. I have after work to do now."

What Science Has Done In Agriculture.

Not only has intensive cultivation taught us how to draw a larger return than formerly from a particular soil and a given surface, but by the selection of seeds we have doubled and trebled the formation of sugar in beet roots, by like selections, the production of the potato has been augmented, and we are seeking, with certainty of success, yet more considerable increase in the production of wheat. So has progress been reached in the production of fruits and vegetables and of cattle, to the daily amelioration of the general condition of the human race.

This advance has been promoted partly by close acquaintance with the general laws of living nature as revealed by disinterested science—laws which are the essential foundation of every application, and equally and in a way no less worthy of admiration by the efforts of inventors, those men of practical ingenuity who labor at the same time for the increase of their own fortunes and for the good and profit of mankind.—P. E. M. Berthelot in Popular Science Monthly.

Heroes In Every Walks of Life.

Whoever has a high and worthy purpose in heart, a solicitude of truth or duty or love, and also the hope, and the courage to work, to sacrifice and to suffer, if need be, for its sake, is worthy of the name of hero. One quietly denies himself pleasure or comfort or ease for the sake perhaps of a sick child. Another gives up cherished plans because they would interfere with the claims of a dependent family. One faces the displeasure of friends and society scorns than forsake his principles; another employs all his power in defense of the weak and against the oppressor.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A newspaper correspondent compiles several columns with descriptions of the seats of the millionaires. What difference does it make?
