Mrs. John Bush, who resided at Fruitvale, Cal., died of her home in middle age a few days ago. The cause is a peculiar one and is worthy of a good deal of interest among the medical profession. Mrs. Bush, a strong and healthy woman, was using her sewing machine, when the needle caught one of her fingers and went into the flesh, causing a slight wound. A few hours later she was taken very ill, and had growing worse, as a physician was sent for. But when he arrived Mrs. Bush was a victim of tetanus. In less than an hour after the accident she was in convulsions. The tetanus in her case came from blood poisoning, caused by the prick of a rusty needle. After the first few convulsions the woman was in a shocking condition. The convulsions came at short intervals and lasting about half an hour. Nothing could be done to ease her suffering, and the convulsive conditions lasted twelve hours. She never came to while in one of the convulsions. The case was a peculiar one in many respects. The wound in the finger was little more than a prick, and not a pain of any kind was felt at first. The surgeon attended to the injury, but the disease, Mrs. Bush died in terrible agony. The physicians who have looked into the case cannot account for the malignancy of the attack.
