TWO BOLD SEA FIGHTS.

WHERE AN AMERICAN FRIGATE WHIPPED GRACK FOREIGN SHIPS.

Commodore Truxtun and the Constellation in the Hostilities with France—The Insurgents Was Captured and the Vengeance Frozen with Heavy Loss.

If fortune always favored the side having the most guns there would not be any battles to write about, for in that case antagonists would simply come together and parade their armaments, and, the superiorities of the best man being decided by the show, would at once shake hands like tweedledee and tweedledum. No, sir-ree, there is no fun for the fire of the thing when she knows she is certain to get the worse of it. The battle is not alone to the strong, when strength is counted by the number of cannon or of soldiers. It requires daring men, however, to stand up and pay the piper and even when the show of odds is heavily against them. American tars never been a warlike nation, but she has been favored in every crisis with men having the nerve to face anything in sea or land.

It was to have been supposed that the long war of the Revolution had exhausted the fighting courage of the patriots, and doubtless France took this view of it when she violated neutrality laws in American waters and allowed her privateers to raid our commerce by seizing merchant ships, as she did at the close of the last century. Such was not the case, though, and when diplomacy failed to redress the wrong, the newly established department of the navy took up the gauntlet. After providing for coast defense four squadrons were sent to the French cruising grounds in the West Indies. One squadron of five vessels, headed by the frigate Constellation and commanded by Commodore Thomas Truxtun, cruised in the vicinity of Porto Rico, and two fights of the Constellation shows against each vessel of the enemy's navy. Compared the victors of simple nerve in deciding which is the better of two antagonists.

France was a strong naval power; America had nothing to depend on but her heroes and her heroes. The merchants, whose business was in danger, supplied the money to bring the "hearts of oak" and "oak of the heart" together, and then the beginning of the navy—for that is what it amounted to—stood ready to face the fleet class war vessels of the Old World.

The Constellation was a fast clipper vessel for that day, but she lacked power to pay when her commander sighted her first victim. It was in February, 1799, off the island of Nevis. Truxtun bore down on the stranger, paying no attention to her hails and signals until he came alongside of the Frenchman, and then delivered a broadside. The enemy replied, and Prisoner Flamarquin, one of the fastest ships in the world, and so good a fighter as sailer. He answered the Frenchman in the usual fashion and keeping up a sharp cannonade.

Truxtun passed on over another and managed to take the Frenchman several times and secure her colors fire. The fighting of the Constellation suffered badly, however, and early in the fight the foremast was cut and was in danger of falling from overweight of yards and sails. Midshipman David Porter, then a lad of eighteen, was in the wounded hospital, and when he found that in the heat of action on the deck below his signals were unnoticed he climbed to the top under a fire of bullets, cut away the fastenings and released the weight so as to prevent the fall of the mast. The fire of the Constellation was low, or what is called "hull shots," and was doing bloody execution among the crew of the Frenchman. After a close broadside, during which Truxtun's ship passed two or three raking broadsides into her antagonist, the affair was decided by a direct stroke of commodore. While the smoke cleared the scene the Constellation was brought across the stern of the Insurgente and was prepared to raake her broadside with a full broadside, which she struck her colors.

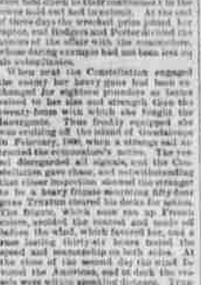
The French crew had suffered terribly, having 70 killed and 41 wounded. The Constellation had 3 men.

PORTER SAVING THE MAST.

The Insurgente carried 40 guns and a complement of 409 men. The Constellation was a 36, with a crew of 309 men. The Frenchmen had been in a ship, while the Yankee vessel was fast and had suffered chiefly in the rigging. In this case the Constellation mounted the heavier guns of the two, having 24-pounders on her main deck, while the Insurgente carried twelves, but the commander did not know that at the outset and he sought the affair with the spirit of fighting with that courage and determination that wins even in the face of odds.

Even after winning their prize the Americans had a struggle to get her to the rendezvous of the squadron, distant more than three days' sail. Just as the Insurgente struck her colors Lieut. Rodgers and young Porter boarded her with a force of only eleven men to take possession and remove the prisoners. After lost few of the crew had been removed, and while Dallas remained on her, it began to blow, and in a short time the wind and rain had become a perfect tempest. Rodgers faced the situation critical, for the decks of the Insurgente were covered with wreck, and the French seemed to show a disposition to rebel against the action of their commander and rise against their captors.

The hatch gratings had been thrown overboard and there were no handcuffs to force the leaders of the mutiny, but young Porter showed courage with which he took of material things and Rodgers placed sentinels at the hatches with orders to shoot down any man who attempted to appear on deck. All the officers of the crew were secured and put out of reach of the Frenchmen, and then began three days of unceasing anxiety and vigilance for Rodgers and young Porter, who surrounded his chief with a big heart in a slender body.



BEAR OF LITTLE JAVITS.

The action began about 5 o'clock and it was long after midnight when it ended and the Frenchmen drew out of the conflict. Meanwhile, for more than five hours, the vessels lay fast side by side, often within pistol shot. The guns of the Constellation were loaded with grape and canister, which proved to be the Vengeance, covered nearly one hundred shots in her hull. She was too heavy and substantially built to be wrecked by the terrible cutting, and carried on in getting away.

When Truxtun saw that the Frenchmen was hauling off he ordered everything made ready to follow close. Just then it was discovered that the mainmast of the Constellation was sprung and was in danger of falling. It was cut away, and in the engagement. The men were ordered from the guns to repair the rigging and secure the mast, for without that the vessel would be useless in the chase. It was late, however, and in a few minutes most and all fell with a crash. Several men were in the rigging, and shortly before it went down an old sailor called to the midshipman—James Jarvis—a mere boy and the youngest officer on board—that the mast would surely go. The young hero answered with the spirit of the hour, "I cannot leave my station," and he, "If the mast goes we land go with it."

All hands were over the side with the wreck, and little Jarvis was lost. The Constellation was now out of the race, and the Vengeance was out of the fight because she had spent her ammunition.

The French vessel had suffered severely in her crew, having 70 killed and 70 wounded. The Constellation had 14 killed and 25 wounded, of 309 men. On that same day, Providence, registered 101 in the shade, while New York city came in as a good second with 100.

On the day of days, where now was the cooled place in this scorched, roasted continent? It was in northern Maine, of course, or in the states bordering on British America in the northeast, or certainly in Canada. Well, no, it was not. It was nowhere else than in that alleged blistering desert, New Mexico. While New England fanned itself and tossed itself and used bad words because of the heat, Santa Fe basked itself into its spring overcoat with the thermometer at 45.

The exports of food products are this year showing a decline over the corresponding months of last year. Perhaps this is already the beginning of the time predicted by economists, when the United States will have no wheat, corn, pork or beef to export, but will need it all for home consumption. The prediction is also made that this will come as great a permanent benefit to farmers as they enjoyed at the close of the war. It may be so. Still, England has for many years consumed considerably more than her farmers could produce, and yet the British agriculturist has not been prosperous.

Independence Day.

Night Thanksgiving day if you like; with New Year's day if your business is promising; shut over Washington's birthday by cutting up your accounts and doing odds and ends of business on the quiet, but keep the Fourth of July. It is enough to make us breathe the prayer of the Pilgrims and thank God we are not as other men, when we contrast our own condition with that of most of the so called republics. These are bankrupt or hard pressed financially, all of them but France, and some of them are fighting among themselves in a way to make one despair of self government among all but blonde nations. We fought once, Greek to Greek, Anglo-Saxon against Anglo-Saxon, and settled the difference then and there. Since then we have gone on from glory to glory, and the Fourth of July belongs now and henceforth equally to both north and south. Be let us celebrate it.

This year in some way persons prepare a speech setting forth the glories yet to come for our people, our splendid natural resources yet to be developed, the latent manufacturing and agricultural possibilities that lie before us, and deliver it at the Fourth of July parade. Let it not be forgotten that Gladstone predicted we should be by 1915 the most powerful people that have been known on the globe in historic times. Our resources are not half unfolded yet; Americans are yet half alive to the riches that lie all about them. There are money and food enough, rightly distributed, to maintain in this country in comfort and luxury 100,000,000 people. Be unfurl the splendid stars and stripes on Independence day and pray that we may gain wisdom to distribute our treasures wisely.

The American Climate.

We have none. We simply have a whirling of temperature which like everything else American, tries to break the record. And it does it. No doubt of that. We defy any other country on this globe to show a thermometer that can tumble head over heels and skip down hill 81 degs. in five hours. Nay, more. It does worse than that. In New York city at the breaking of the unprecedented heat wave in June, the weather clerk was watching the thermometer at the moment the mad wave struck it, and actually saw the mercury go down 16 degs. in five minutes. Fact. We have the authority of the whole United States government to back it up. In what other country of the earth can it be boiling at 5 o'clock in the morning and the thermometer stand 20 degs. below zero at 6 o'clock next morning?

You never know when or how the heat or cold is going to strike you. It can be usually predicted of any place that it will be either warm or cold at a given time of the year, and certain spots are usually known to have a "spell" of weather while certain others, such as Everywhere but in America, that is New England, is supposed to be reasonably cool, for instance, yet on the late January hot June day the thermometer was as high at Portland, Me., as in many of the southern cities. Boston and Galveston had just the same temperature at the same hour of the day. So did Cleveland and New Orleans.

At 8 o'clock in the morning when was the hottest place in North America? Was it Key West or Mobile or anywhere in Arizona? No, it wasn't. It was in Pittsburg, that cold northern city, whose whose smoke the foothills of the near clad Allegheny frown everlastingly down. The temperature there at 8 o'clock a. m. was 86. On that same day, Providence, registered 101 in the shade, while New York city came in as a good second with 100.

On the day of days, where now was the cooled place in this scorched, roasted continent? It was in northern Maine, of course, or in the states bordering on British America in the northeast, or certainly in Canada. Well, no, it was not. It was nowhere else than in that alleged blistering desert, New Mexico. While New England fanned itself and tossed itself and used bad words because of the heat, Santa Fe basked itself into its spring overcoat with the thermometer at 45.
