Dramatic and Lyric.

Last Night's Variety Show—Stuart Robson—Lady Windermere's Fan—The Willie Testimonial—Gilbert & Sullivan Revivals—The Sauerbrunnen.

A good form of variety and vaudeville show was always popular in Salt Lake, and the name of John Hopkins, who has been the controlling influence behind the Howard Athenæum shows for a good many years, sufficed to draw out a large audience at the Theater last evening. The audience was in all ways paid for its evening in the new treats provided by such old favorites as Billy Van, Kara, Melville & Stetson and Will H. Fox, and by the original acts of quite new people as De Bersell and the Lamoos. The evening was the one of varied merriment and novelty. Van seems quite to have supplanted such old favorites as Thatcher, Blue and Wilson, and his negro title were stive-splitting; Kara, the juggler, is as clever as ever; Melville & Stetson are two ladies who, while they dancing but little, if at all, are such clever imitators that they kept the house in an uproar, and the one who is so much like May Irwin is specially clever. Fox gave the same continued instances of good piano playing, humorous sayings and laughable stillness—his act can hardly be described by any other language—that he gave before. The Lamoo family, five in all, did some exceedingly clever tumbling and acrobatic work. A feature of interest in their appearance was that the head of the family, a very old man, and his daughter, a middle-aged woman, occupied a skill near the stage. The couple had just arrived from Paris, where they have lived for a good many years past. They came over from Antigua twenty or forty years ago, leaving the remainder of their family behind, and their reunion here, though under such strange auspices, it may be imagined, was a very happy one. The old gentleman looked alike proud, doubtful and bewildered as he made the plaudits occasioned by the work of the performers. De Bersell, a musician in dog, gave an act new to the variety stage in sounding he on the eyes of the audience a lump of "dull, sensible clay" into the words they finally took form of Red a Demon, and next an Indian; or is an artist in every sense of the word. The last appearance will, without doubt, draw a second good audience this evening.

Despite the advance in prices which Robson's manager insisted on, even to the extent of saying it was a dollar and a half or a go by, the theater people say Robson will play a fine engagement here. There was a good demand for seats yesterday, especially for the Hamlets. In the Comedy of Errors, the bill for Wednesday evening, the Two Dromios will be played by Mr. Robson and John L. Wonderer, an actor who has risen to a high rank through the fact of his close resemblance to Robson. They are said to look almost like twin brothers, which is, of course, the reason why he is with Robson in Shakespeare's comedy. The charming face of Mrs. Robson, who made her original hit here when she was May Waldron, will be a strong addition to Robson's forces.

Next Friday and Saturday evening we are to have our first glimpse of the much advertised Lady Windermere's Fan.

Oscar Wilde, the author, says that Lady Windermere's Fan has already paid him $10,000 in royalties, or more than his books, newspaper articles and poems have brought him in the last twenty years. No wonder that he is determined to keep on writing plays. The success of the play has been even more emphatic in this country than in England. During its run of 120 nights at Palmer's theatre, New York, it was played to large and fashionable audiences. On the first Saturday in New York run the receipts for the two performances, afternoon and evening, were $2,800, something unknown even for a great success.

Society, musicians and amateurs seem to be vying with each other in a generous endeavor to see who can do most toward making the Weber benefit matinee a rousing success. The program is going to be a choice one, and it has one feature, especially, the first appearance of Miss Viola Pratt since her return from her very successful sojourn in New York, which may be relied on to help the sales fabulous in their proportions. Miss Pratt looks in the best of trim and says she is happy to be home again, and doubly happy that her first new song she made might be sung for the benefit of a musician like William Weber. Mr. Easton is coming down from his hermitage in Logan to sing a song and take part in the ever glorious Lucia sextette, the other singers for which will be Mrs. Edwards, Miss Pratt, Mr. Piper, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Spencer. Miss Ruth Eldridge, who went east at the same time as Miss Pratt to study elocution, and who is also at home, will give a recitation. Mr. Weber will himself, of course, give a number, which equally of course will be multiplied by three. Mr. Krouse and Mr. Stockham will work into their aid, and a stage committee, headed by Mrs. Hamilton and Prof. Stone, and including that irrepressible ticket seller, Mrs. Amelia Cummings, is doing all that is necessary to insure a positive success. The whole thing I will be an event—it now set for Monday, July 2.

The weekly vacancy of the Lyceum Theater is filled, and the management will probably run there to the floors for the week which closes tonight. A Night Off has drawn so well that it might run several nights longer, but Mr. O'Malley was determined to live to his policy of giving the new bill every Monday night, and selecting a week of comedy which a week of romance or sentiment. The Wages of Sin will be the bill next week.

Gilbert & Sullivan revivals are all the rage in the east. The Mikado and Patience have been immensely in New York and Chicago, and Camille D'Arville's coming has just revived the Pirates of Penzance with decided success in Boston. There is an exhilarating element all over the country on comic, high class comic opera, and as there has never been anything written of that class to equal Gilbert & Sullivan's works, we may look for a bound in these gilded Englishman's productions recall silly to that which they originally experienced. The bubble is just as keen in Salt Lake as anywhere, and our talented amateurs will probably awaken to the fact during the coming fall and winter, that is, if real theatricals and opera have any act of future in Salt Lake, of which just now there seems to be a large degree of doubt. But we would not be at all surprised if this widespread depression, which casts such a gloom over amusement everywhere as well as business enterprise, were to prove the very thing that brings about a revival in home industries and operatics. Foreign attractions are so amount of enabling our to expensive tour across the continent, that visits from them are becoming few and far between, and ultimately towns plus cities may be driven to turn to the native article for their diversion or to cease to go without them. It was circumstances like these that gave birth to the Home Dramatic club in 1875, a dramatic representation that recalls so much of a party to those days that the first advertisements of the Home club were headed "The Drama Once More," and everyone remembers with what a rushing, and with what a refreshing sense of novelty those early performances of The Romance of a Poor Young Man, Rose-lake, The Banker's Daughter, etc., were greeted by the public. If there does come another home or home-made home drama or opera, we do not lack for amateur material already and willing to take advantage of it.

In spite of all talk that has been heard of late with regard to the death of American leading men, so explains a manager as Henry Irving has seen ever here to secure a leading man for his Lyceum company next year, says the New York Sun. Mr. E. H. Vandefelt is the lucky man who has been engaged to replace Mr. William Terriss. Mr. Terriss leaves Mr. Irving's company at the close of the present London season. He and Miss Milward will then return to their old love, the Adelphi, where they are under a three-year contract to appear in melodramas. Two months ago Mr. Vandefelt signed a contract with Julia Marlowe to act as her leading man next year. Miss Marlowe's marriage however, knocked that plan on the head. Miss Marlowe became Mrs. Taber, she has decree to emulate Mrs. Kendal and have her husband for her leading man. The Irving engagement found all parties concerned out of the difficulties. Miss Marlowe is delighted to secure Mr. Vandefelt, and Mr. Vandefelt, under the circumstances, is equally delighted to be released.

A New York letter to the San Francisco News and Dramatic says: Edward H. Osborne, who sails with Daniel Frohman on the City of Paris tomorrow, is a very sick man and goes to Europe for his health. He had to cancel several one-night stands during the last part of his tour, so he fainted several times on the stage. He is afflicted with extreme nervous weakness, for which he has been taking drugs for years. The Marlowe wine that he consumed at one time would have killed a few persons and flight man, but he found a false stimulant in it. He has been down completely and his physician insists upon absolute rest and quiet.

Edwin Milton Royle, the author of Friends, does not believe in selling the products of his pen. He thinks he ought to be paid for his labors for instance by writing to order. He proposes to make the company now engaged in interpreting Friendship prominent at Saratoga for the production of his new play one week before the termination of the coming season. Mr. Royle will produce the new play, which is a romantic drama of historic interest, the scene being laid in Mexico.

The Rainy Girl, which the Grimes folks of New York took at the Madison Square Garden theater, probably is the biggest musical success ever made anywhere. From the Welsh Rarebit of last year goes into metropolitan history. A chorus of 50 male voices is expected to sing in the hall dress concert which will be given from a stage in Mr. Madison Square Garden every night. They come from singing societies in every city east of the Mississippi, and the New York committees have been rehearsing them for nearly a year past. A dozen of the most popular solo singers of the world have been engaged, Hornsby, lead of the piano firm, will preside, and among the prizes to be awarded are a dozen Steinway pianos. President Cleveland was expected to come from Washington to formally open the affair, but the dispatches say the press of public business will prevent his attending.

FORESTRY.

A somewhat special observation of the Wasatch mountains in Utah county leads me to attach more importance than ever before to the subject of forestry, but the possibility of again clothing the mountains with timber seems more certain. There are at least seven species of tree growing naturally in our mountains which are valuable either for fuel or lumber. There are two or more species of pine, the poplar, the maple, the species of cottonwood and one or two species of willows. Of these the pines, the poplar and the maple grow very nearly up to the snow line. East of Springville the groves of poplar are grown at an altitude of between 10,000 and 11,000 feet, and most of the conifers in that section are lined with trees and bushes from their house to where they open from the valleys. In inaccessible places maple and willowwood trees have grown to a size which makes them valuable for either fuel or lumber, and especially valuable to check the ground and thereby prevent the rapid erosion, and to act as checks to torrential rains, preventing floods. The size to which these trees have grown indicates that our native trees will attain goodly proportions if they are given an opportunity. In Hobble Creek canyon, about three and a half miles above its mouth, is a beautiful grove of native trees. The owner has simply cleared away the brush, and increasingly and were trees as he has needed, but he has not cut a tree like an owner and not like a vandal.

The most practical forestry work to begin with, would perhaps be to encourage the growth of trees along the canyon streams. Take shoots to them by proper trimming, and thinning such trees as are already growing there, and gradually setting out trees which experience shows will profitably grow in such places. Were this done, thousands of acres of land which are now useless, would be serving a double purpose, for they would not only be conserving our water supply, but they would be growing into valuable timber for use in the near future.

The past heavy work should be to set out trees around the head waters of the principal irrigating streams. In many cases this would be somewhat expensive, as it might be necessary to fence several square miles of land away from stock, but the value of the timber would soon compensate for the expense, and even sheepowners would be benefited with the rest, for the most valuable sheep feed grows on the shaded ground.

It will be a slow and somewhat difficult task to get trees started on the more mountain sides. Probably the most practical thing for the moment is with the to find some grass that will grow in such places, and begin the seeding of the mountains with it. It will serve a double purpose, furnishing food to stock, and keeping the ground loose so that water may readily penetrate it and furnish a supply for the springs.

I feel sure that thousands of acres of good land in Utah are unused now at the present time. Were this all, it would be bad enough, but the fact is not only bad, it is constantly deteriorating owing to the fertile soil being washed away. Should not this be changed? Would it not be better, even at some present expense, to get as much as possible of our new section land into trees which will gradually grow into very great value?

A GIANT'S BODY,

THAT WAS WASHED ASHORE ON FAR ROCKAWAY BEACH.

(N. Y. Herald, Sun. June 17.)

There is great excitement at Rockaway Beach today—more than there has been in that place for some time. It is all on account of an old, black, Waterwitched human body that floated ashore there this morning and that now lies on view outside in a room at the Hotel Albright.

All day long throngs of people have been crowding up to it, not because it is only a human body—they come solely frequently at Rockaway—but because it is certainly the moral residue of a giant.

At about 9 o'clock Edward Stokes, the clerk at the Albright, went to bathing. He was looking up and down in the breakers, enjoying the cool water, scrubbing and rolling in the sand when he chanced to look on the back of what seemed a great log that was carried to by a big roller and touched on land.

When he came to the surface again he saw the object was a human body. He swam out again and seized it by the hair, and he was terrified to see what seemed long, black matted hair streaming from the back. Then he saw the skin and knew it was a dead body.

Mr. Smith did not like such a bathing companion, and he swam on good home. Presently he met a lifeguard and a number of other men, who hurried in crowded to drag the monstrous object ashore.

Smith's second surmise proved correct. It was a dead body and a huge one. It was shockingly, the last word goes, and the body black and visible, having evidently been in the water a very long time. The features were totally unrecognizable.

Its great size at once brought the men to make measurements, and they obtained the following results: Length from top of head to end of toes, 6 feet 7 inches; length of arm, 2 feet 5 inches; width of shoulders, 2 feet 5 inches; length of forefinger, 1 inches.

The news of the strange catch took spread, and quickly a large crowd was gathered on the beach viewing it. There were many surmises as to whence it came. The old salts who gathered about declared that it must be the body of a man who was drowned on a steamship that was wrecked on the beach on at three winters ago. The steamvessel, it seems, got among the breakers.

But one man was made out to have had he was seen to be a native of Belgium. He refused all offers of aid, and carried the small dark with a blanket over his shoulder. When the boat broke and went down he sprang into the breakers and disappeared.

It seems hardly probable, however, that the body could have come in after so long a time.
