Fourth District Court.

The case of Frank Joseph and Ferdinand Pattee vs Lafayette Holbrook and S. M. Douglas occupied the entire time in the Fourth district court yesterday, and will doubtless take several days longer. The ground upon which defendants claim they are not liable, resolves to Joseph & Pattee in favor and Cropper is taken upon by the issue of S. W. Scott was a partner with Joseph & Pattee in buying the sheep and sale, with Reed and Cropper in selling the sheep to Joseph & Pattee, and that they as agents had no notice of the double partnership. It was through the action of this case, Scott, that the issues were sustained. Joseph & Pattee, however, deny that Scott was in partnership with them.

Indigestion the Cause of Consumption!

Dr. William H. Hayden claims that the principal cause of consumption is in really indigestion. He says: When the gastric secretion loses its natural qualities, or the stomach is at fault as to proper secretion of the ferments, the result is fermentation, which divides food into the form of chemic products, so soon to undergo putrefaction, when the contents are ejected, and life is the scene of indigestion. The bowels and stomach produce poisons. The adult is thus contined to unwholesome, infectious food, the youth the environment, deteriorated healthy family, for it is to be sowing time of life, and maturity reaps the harvest. The boy begets the father of the man. Dating from period of puberty, Hayden puts forth every effort to carry on the building process; she checks everything which is not needed; the whole body thrives with the as at no other time; the structure of every of building materials are taken larger and worked in their normal capacity; the appetite is gauged according to the needs of the body, and not by the ability to digest; hence sufficient gastric secretion, over-eating, or improperly in taking food at this time is likely to result in disorders of the stomach and fermentation of food, and the little portions of undigested material, being sucked up by the enlarged and greedy mouth and absorbents, and carried by the circulation always through the right side of the heart into the lungs, where these little particles obstruct the minutely divided blood-vessels of the apex of the lungs, and a foreign body, forms organisms into tubercle now frequently changed to the calcareous or cheesy deposits so often found. Such tubercular formations are found only when the arterial circulation is so minutely divided, the apex of the lungs being first exposed to that danger.

During the period of growth and maturity with the growth of tubercle, impulses from the face and body and the irritation of the nasal mucous membrane and bronchi easily set up the impetuous, tempestative physiologic, and the impulsive cancer of the thoughtless youth. Yet how few ever consecutive thoughts upon the subject. Hayden was a tutor and long specialist, twenty-five years—has so treated the writer that tubercles are never occasioned in the thorough and large structure; that they are the natural result of the conditions described above, and which exist at no other period of life.
