MY LODGER'S WIFE.

"More convicts is off, ma'am," was his answer; "and I hear there is some fellow of consequence among 'em. Poor chap! He's sure to be caught such a night as this, if he hasn't tumbled over the face of a cliff already."

I had him good night, and closed the door, still adding in my mind that I had previously been. It always made me sorrowful when I heard of the poor convicts trying to escape. Whatever their faults may have been, liberty is a sweet to all of us, and very few of them ever succeeded in getting away—hardly any, although many a one had lost his life in trying. I took the beer up to Mr. Lewis' room, and tapping at his door, said, "I generally did 'em in your beer, Mr. Lewis," and, as usual, the door was opened and he took it from me. Instead of having his lamp burning, as was his custom, his room was in complete darkness, so that I could hardly see him, to give him the jug, and in the gloom he seemed to look stouter and taller than usual. He did not speak, however, he generally had a little joke; but now he took the jug in silence. I lingered for a moment; but finding that he did not speak, I was going down stairs, when I thought of his wife. Mr. Lewis had almost closed the door, when I said how anxious I felt about her getting safely in through the storm, when, to my amazement, he replied, without opening the door more than a few inches, "I am much obliged for your kindness, Mrs. Gerran, but my wife has been in for this hour past." I never was so astonished in my life. I had made two or three little preparations to comfort her, and felt hurt that I should not have been informed of her arrival. "Yes," he continued, "she came when the wind was roaring so loudly, that you did not hear her knock. I let her in; and as she was tired and wet, I thought the best thing she could do was to lie down at once." Well, perhaps it was, but I could not help fancying that for all that, they might have treated me with a little more consideration. However, I could say nothing; and so I went to bed, and as soon as the storm would allow, to sleep.

The first thing I heard in the morning, from my milkman, was that only one of the convicts had tried to escape, and that for the present he was still at large. It was rumored in the town that it was Colonel La Tourette who had got away, but the government people would not say much about it, the whole place was so full of excitement.

I heard the same kind of tidings repeated; and, in fact, I saw enough to convince me that extraordinary exertions were being made to capture the runaway. The White Lion was searched by a party of officers, and so was a house in the same street as my own, where a number of young men lodgers were taken. I heard, too, that the railways were watched, not only at our station, but that the trains were examined at places twenty or thirty miles off, in case the convict should get in at some little station. It was supposed, however, that although these precautions were taken, he was still in the island, as, from his wearing the prison dress, it would be so difficult for him to escape notice.

I did not see Mr. Lewis all day, nor his wife; but, just at twilight, I was startled by the latter coming quietly into my little kitchen, and taking me for the milk. She was a pretty looking young woman, wearing her hair in short curls; it was fair and she was fair too, quiet and shy in her manner, speaking in a voice so low that I could scarcely hear her. She explained that her husband had, unfortunately, taken a severe cold, and would be obliged to keep his bed for a day or so. Of course, I offered any assistance in my power. She thanked me, and went up stairs. When she had gone, I could do nothing for the life of me, for many minutes, but sit and think of her; there was an unaccountable feeling, quite a certainty, it seemed, of having known her before, although when or where I could not say. So strong and strange was this impression, that I was almost terrified to me, and, as I said, I could think of nothing else for a long time. However, I shook the feeling off at last, and went about my work, seeing no more of my lodger or his wife that night.

Robert at the White Lion told me, when he brought the supper beer, that, although it was hushed up as much as possible, yet it certainly was the Fenian who had escaped, and that it was one of the most desperate and ingenious escapes ever heard of. "Ma'am," he said, "as I believe in any of your ingenious escapes. I don't believe in a man doing with a rusty nail, or to prongs of a dinner fork, or some such thing, in four or five hours, what it would take a couple of smiths all day to do with a basket of tools. It's the warders, ma'am, and they make these excuses; that's what it is, ma'am." This was the opinion of Robert at the White Lion, and I must own that I had, on similar occasions, heard many people in Weymouth express themselves in the same effect.

Once or twice the next day I saw Mrs. Lewis, and each time the impression that I had previously met her, grew stronger; I fancied, however, that my looking straight at her, to try and remember when it could have been, disturbed her, so I avoided doing so as much as possible, but for the life of me I could not help doing it sometimes. On the following morning, I felt it to go out for an hour or two, and when I came back, I found my windows cleaned, the mould in the flower boxes turned over, and various little things done, which told me that Lewis had been at work again. I found, however, the case. He had, unfortunately, been taken very unwell just before I came home, but previously he had been busy as usual in the front of the house.
