OGDEN.

OGDEN, UTAH, APRIL 18, 1895.

Junction Notes.

Ogden received with open arms the information that the Pioneer Power Electric company have let contracts that will involve the expenditure of $500,000 in Ogden energy.

The chamber of commerce has appointed a committee to arrange for the reception of and to tender a meeting to be held by the members of the Silver party passing through the West.

Heavy shipments of fruit continue to pour in. Union Sister was ship Oregon are passing through from the East.

Quite a crowd assembled at the Union depot last evening to witness the arrival of the remains of Hiscox Lamont from San Francisco en route to Ilion, Montana. The deceased is one of the young ladies so cruelly murdered in the Lamont Baptist church, San Francisco.

Last evening a little girl was wheeling a baby in a buggy when a dog ran at a cow, which in its fright, attempted to jump over the baby carriage but struck it and tumbled it to pieces, fortunately not injuring the baby, which was thrown out and fell upon a pillow.

On account of the falling off of freight shipments during the past week a number of freight trains crews have been laid off the railways.

Don Hurlburt is around on crutches with a sprain sustained the same.

BACK TO LONDON.

How Two Million People Are Supplied Twice a Day.

What may be called the milk railway extends, roughly speaking, 50 miles from Charing Cross. Outside this circle a certain amount of milk is sent to town. It can be carried for miles and yet make a profit, for considerations of time as well as money enter into the question, and for all practical purposes it may be said that a two hours' railway journey is the most the milk has to undergo before arriving at its destination. The milk train is a familiar sight at most of the main line stations in the metropolis, and its unloading, carried on in an amazingly short space of time by porters whose much practice has made skilled in handling the heavy cans, is well worth watching. There are two deliveries every day. The morning delivery appears at our breakfast tables, the evening delivery arrives our afternoon tea. It is supposed to be a regular fact before it starts on its journey for being hedged, but to a good many cows the formality is dispensed with, and it is passed straight from the milking pail into the can without being touched in any way. According to all accounts, there is very little "doctoring" of milk of this sort at the London end. Whatever adulteration there may be, and it is a matter for congratulation that it grows less day by day, is done after the milk arrives in town. It is said, as a rule, pass through the hands of only one retailer before it gets to the customer. There is the shrewd suspicion to be reckoned with. Unless a dairyman is "strong," say, 20 cans a day he will have a difficulty in making a contract with the producer; so he must lay his milk in London from one of the wholesale dealers. None of these, and there are a good many companies among them, are wholesale dealers only. They all have milk "walks" of their own, and most of them possess farms, from which their customers fondly imagine, if they know no better, that their private supplies come. It is safe to say that in nine-tenths of the cases the milk they receive is not the product of the farm, but is purchased in the open market. Cows are merely conditions and can be produced at the northern of the milk they sell than the store with one cow, who may likely obtain his supplies from one or other of them.

Of course the middleman has to pick up in everything else, get the lion's share of the profits. The producer has just twice as much as it cost to lay down at a London railway station. Englishmen's prejudice in the matter from which the farmer receives for the carriage paid milk, fourpence a quart is added to the average price which the consumer pays to his milkman—a price which allows him a very substantial margin for expenses—that is, assuming he is content to leave it in the state of virgin purity to which it arrives in the first place. If not, there is quite a simple way of increasing the bulk of the milk and the profits. He does not add water to it, that is a method absolutely out of date, but because the consumer of the millennium has grown more tender, but because it is a hazardous proceeding, which, sooner or later, sends in the police court and gets one fined. The enterprising milkman who would satisfy the inspector and impose on his customers merely adds "separated milk" to the genuine article, and provided he is not too complete the detection will
