FOUR WEEKS MORE.

Four weeks more, and the great presidential campaign will be closed. The voter will have made his mark—X—in little ballots, and that mark will have indicated who is to be President of the United States for the next four years, so far as the choice of the voter has anything to do with the result. But the day after election will suggest that well nigh half of the political prophets in the country are of the "that's order does not deter them from political predictions made with as much confidence as though there were no assurance of their being correct, for that is human nature, in politics.

It is quite interesting to note the estimates of the outcome. One eminent authority, who knows all about presidential campaigns and the state of the voters' pulse, figures it up that Citizen McKinley will have 303 votes in the electoral college, while his opponent will have a crumb of 55 votes to support to him that he really was made president, another equally well informed and authoritative calculator announces that Citizen Bryan will receive just 313 of the college votes, and allows a offer of 229 to remind the other fellow that he is not wanted at the White House. On these prognostications one side or the other are fixing the respective cabinets and other important appointments, feeling temporary comfort in the air castles constructed.

As yet, however, there are many elements which leave the whole matter in doubt. Each side is secret of one thing—a formidable opposition. None can discern with satisfactory distinctness the misdemeanors that is working in the ranks. There are men who are loud in their advocacy of one view of some issue who will be so impressed with others that they will be found voting in what seems to many a most inconsistent form; there are others who tell everybody how they feel and will vote that way, whether or not it is good judgment. All in all, there probably never was an election where the real issues of the voters was more thoroughly hidden than at present.

It is a good thing that the weather will keep on getting cooler to election day—it may aid in cooling the ardor of politicians, and especially those whose bigotry would use violence to prevent others from expressing a different view. As for conservative voters, they will hold their heads level, cast their ballots for the best men, and awake on the morning of November 4th to learn that that class of voters has gathered the day and made the country so safe as the more statesmanlike of its voters—the people—can do it possible to do.

A CREDITABLE ENTERPRISE.

A visit to the mouth of the Cottonwood canyon, where enterprise and engineering skill are busily engaged turning the energy of the crystal stream into power for industrial purposes is quite interesting, particularly to one who makes the city for the first time. The scenery is grand, the rapids are exhilarating, and the two power houses—one already in working order and the other nearing completion—are well worth seeing.

Work on the Utah Power company's plant, situated at the foot of the Narrows, is now so far advanced that the managers hope to have everything in working order in December. The power-house will soon be ready to receive the machinery, and the wheel that is to convey the electric fluid to the city is being placed in position as rapidly as practicable.

In order to obtain the necessary water power the company constructed a flume nearly two miles long, and its contents are conveyed through a strong iron pipe, four feet in diameter, to the machinery. The pressure obtained is sufficient to yield a force equal to about 2,000 horse power. Mr. W. Reid, superintendent of the street car company, explains that this will be used at about the same monthly expense now incurred in order to obtain 600 horse power, and that the saving consequently will be considerable, a great amount of energy being left for various purposes. The enterprise is a credit to the company and will undoubtedly be of benefit to the community. Its chief local capital, we believe, that is invested in this enterprise.

SELECT WITH CARE.

The persistence with which strikers resort to violence, and the continuous successive strikes strikes will be appealed to as a means of settling difficulties, is a notable warning to the citizens to maintain a government that is firm in willing enough and strong enough to act with vigor and decision to overcome unlawful demonstrations in short order. The country has on record a point when there is no more danger of internal difficulties whenever the participants must be restrained by overwhelming force to keep within lawful bounds. Hence, constancy is to be found in entrusting power in high or low degree to officials who will not use it for the public tranquility anywhere under their jurisdiction.

There are at least two ways of finding out whether a candidate for office will maintain principles of freedom among the people, for the latter's general enjoyment. One is by the promises and protestations of that candidate. If his declared policy is one that intimates a holding back of civil liberty with violent outbreaks, shifting the responsibility to subordinates, he declares himself unwise and not to trust with executive power. He might use it properly and promptly when the occasion demands, but his protestations would make the uncertain. Another and safer way is to predetermine what the candidate will do in to observe the class of people he is training with to get into office. If he gathers around him leaders and adherents, if he panders to irresponsible and lawless elements, the natural thing to conclude is that he will be the tool of those powers which created him. Hence the man to lead affairs, for instance, whose associationships and affiliations are against the taxpayers is the man for the latter to pace by when it comes to marking their ballots. Not all persons who are not taxpayers are to be classed as against them; for there are professional office seekers who are seldom found anywhere else.

Of the people who are the most easily gulled for the office seeker, the respectable portion of the community furnishes by far the greater proportion. Being honest and straightforward themselves, they do not readily suspect antagonistic attitudes to others that there have been so many illustrations the past few years, that the unsuspecting element should have to wisdom teeth cut by this time. Those who come up for official favor should be carefully scanned, and if their records and association will not bear close scrutiny, let them be laid on the shelf. Select good men; select with care; and then stand by the choice. Thus schemers will be turned down and unprofitable rings and combinations will be broken up. But the voter must display nerve, cool judgment and good "horse sense" to win in the contest.

A GREAT INSTITUTION.

The reports of the recent Sunday school conferences again point out the fact that these schools are a great institution in the Church for the training of the young people in the Gospel. Nothing could be more encouraging or suggestive of permanent growth than the inter and spirit of these reports. They show that among the Latter-day Saints an organization of something near a hundred thousand members is pursuing the course in a steady, systematic manner, under divine inspiration and guidance, in training the youth in comprehension of God and their relation and obligations to Him, as set forth in the Gospel of Christ.

A cause of deep gratification is the the work of this vast organization is not an artificial, but beautiful in its reality. Its showing is not so much in numbers as in the practical illustration of what it accomplishes. It permeates every village and hamlet; it reaches to every home; it reaches the heart as well as the mind of the child. For instance, there may be mind the singing of the children of Zion, which is but an illustration of the effect of all the training in the Sunday schools. It is notable that there is more life, more feeling, more inspiration connected with such singing than is commonly the case with other. Hence, when visitors who come here have the opportunity of hearing the children sing, although they have heard children elsewhere in similar exercises, go into ecstacies over the Mormon songs; and when the Elders who are on missions sing the hymns of Zion they are listened to as no others are. The reason is not that the music is followed more closely, but that there is a depth of inspiration which is made a necessary part of the song. The music is not from the throat alone; it is from the soul, and it is poured out through the words of the song as well as the tuneful notes. So prominently is this the case that the words of the song strike the listener's ear with as much devotional force as do the notes with their rich melody. An instance of this was given in the Sunday school conference Sunday evening, when the great choir sang that beautiful children's hymn, "I'm out lovely Deseret." Hundreds of voices blended as one in a power accentuating; there was not a word, not a syllable that could not be distinctly heard by the vast audience, and a stenographic reporter in any part of the Tabernacle could have taken an perfect a report of the words (even if he never heard them before) as if they had been spoken by the most accomplished elocutionist. And singing is but a type of the instruction given in the Sunday schools in all departments of their work.

In this training of the heart and mind of the pupil, the Sunday schools of the Saints are in advance of all other like organizations elsewhere. Naturally this should be the case, for the instructors are the active inspirers of God and blessed by Him to the work. There are engaged in the labor of the schools Apostles, Seventies, High Priests, Elders, Bishops and other Church officers. They have the law of the Gospel, and they have the inspiration of God to exercise it in power. It is a holy, sacred calling in a great missionary field, not for the praise of man but the glory of the Lord and the salvation of His people. The key to the success of the great Sunday school movement in the Church is the fact of the divine inspiration which rests with its workers—their perfect harmony with the divinely constituted authorities of the Church. Systems of teaching may improve by changes according to circumstances, but the basis of progress and permanency is in strict conformity to the revelations of the Lord, and on this there is no limit to the good that it will yet be to be accomplished. Upon that foundation is scope for increased energy and faithfulness in the Sunday school cause.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

England is discussing the celebration of the sixty-years' reign of Queen Victoria, to be held next year. She has now wielded the scepter of Great Britain longer than any of her predecessors. Her grandfather, George III, reigned 59 years and 110 days.

It was the 20th of June, 1837, at half past 2 in the morning, that the young queen, just awakened from her sweet slumbers, was notified that she had inherited the throne. Her reign from that time has been marked with marvelous prosperity in every direction, and it is but natural that loyal Englishmen should see in her the embodiment of all that legend in a monarchical form a government. She has, of course, taken but little active part in the affairs of state, she has generously submitted to the representatives of the people and applied her prerogatives in a manner worthy of a constitutional monarchy. She has, whenever it has been possible for her to exercise her personal influence, done so in favor of peace and harmony between the nations. She is, therefore, at the end of her reign, one of the most popular rulers of the world, honored on account of her position and admired for her many good personal qualities.

A SUCCESSFUL LAW.

Notwithstanding the predictions of failure to follow its enforcement, and the ridicule which has been heaped upon its administration since it came into effect, the Raines liquor law in New York is proving a success. Of course it is not completely satisfactory to temperance people who would like to see the liquor traffic suppressed by more vigorous measures than this. In fact, it may be said that the Raines law has not reduced the consumption of spirituous and malt liquors; but it has reduced the number of opportunities for children to be led into the drinking habit, and in that way is laying the foundation for a serious inroad upon drunkenness, and as consequent increase in the ranks of the sober-minded population.

But it is in its revenue aspect that the law has shown its capabilities. When it was before the state legislature Mr. Raines urged its passage on the ground that it was a measure for the relief of the overburdened taxpayers of the state, and the short trial of it, in the city of New York, shows that it produced a large amount of revenue, even in times when revenues of all other kinds are falling off. Under the old law there were, in the city of New York, 10,115 saloons and drinking places, which yielded the city a revenue of $1,790,653. Under the Raines law the number of drinking places has been reduced to 7,310, while the revenue received was $4,357,919.25, of which one-third (or $1,019,306) went to the state treasury and the remainder to the city treasury. This shows a reduction in the number of saloons of about twenty-seven per cent, while the increase of revenue to the city alone has been about doubled, to say nothing of the sum received by the state. As a partial offset to this it may be said that the law is more expensive to operate under the old statute, but its increase in this regard is insignificant compared to the gain it makes to the public treasury.

The administration of the Raines law has been attended with much difficulty because of the opposition of the saloon element, but very officials have stood up to the task, and have proved that it can be enforced to the accomplishment of its object. In making the liquor traffic bear a greater burden than before of the expense which that traffic adds to government, the Raines law has gained many friends among those who were against it at its inauguration, and its tendency to save the next generation from the debasing liquor habit is to be welcomed by every one who desires to see nothing to receive more general encouragement from temperance people, as an excellent measure so far as it goes.

TWELVE HUNDRED missionaries from this part of the country out in the world preaching the Gospel, in a few years ought to give the people generally a fair idea of the strictly scriptural religion which the Latter-day Saints have espoused.

THE POLITICAL party that makes class distinctions in its own ranks in naming candidates may learn that the voters know how to administer a stinging, rebuke at the polls.

Your complete dependency or utter disparity of being relieved by some one woman should suffer from the peculiar weakness of their sex, is one of the most hostile symptoms. The entire nervous system and the mind are so affected that there seems to be nothing in life worth living for. A woman's whole outlook upon life is darkened by any derangement of the delicate organism which gives her her womanhood.

Some women hardly realize that this is the one and only cause of all their misery. Doctors frequently treat them for neuralgia or dyspepsia or insomnia. Beside this, some women shrink from the ordeal of examinations and local treatment which doctors are sure to insist upon.

There is an end of these difficulties; there is no need of enduring this misery and unhappiness. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription cures the complaints of the feminine organism completely and permanently. It is the most perfect remedy ever devised for that purpose. It is a male medicine for women's troubles invented by a regularly graduated physician, a skilled and scientific expert who has spent a lifetime in studying the special class of diseases.

Mrs. Emma McPherson, of Box 48 South Main street, Hamilton, Ohio, writes: "I feel it my duty to write little more to my sisters who are suffering each day from the same disease I have suffered from for years. My afflictions were 'female weakness' and kidney complaint. The kidneys gave me much trouble, that I could not walk without pain. I was so nervous that I could not sleep, waking for hours, I only lived and suffered. But the Lord has worked in my behalf, better medicine, and if I can only be the means of bringing light and delicate sufferers to the knowledge of health, by telling them of that great, wonderful remedy, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, I shall be thankful. I was sick a long time and was completely cured. I feel that this will save many a life, and give thoughtful women, happiness and ease and to cheer up."
