BURIED WHILE LIVING.

THREE REMARKABLE CASES OF UNFORTUNATE INTERMENTS.

A Husband Discovers His First Wife's Skeleton Outside of the Coffin—A Lover Rescues His Sweetheart—Students Resuscitate a Friend.

The wife of a wealthy merchant was taken suddenly ill with a disease that baffled the science, skill and medical knowledge of all the physicians in the neighborhood. She supposed to have a succession of violent seizures which lasted for different periods. She regained consciousness after long intervals and talked intelligently to those around her.

After she had been ill for a week she began to sink, and late one night relapsed into a deadly faint. Three days and three nights passed, and still she did not recover.

The physicians made a thorough examination and unanimously declared that life was extinct. Pulsation had entirely ceased. Her face assumed a death-like pallor. The function became hard and rigid, and the flesh stiffened.

A PITIABLE CASE.

Dead she certainly was, and all the medical men, and two days afterward the was buried in the family vault. When she was month had elapsed any the merchant married again. Soon after his second marriage the vault was opened to receive the remains of a relative. The merchant himself touched the spring which caused the lid to fly open.

As the top of the vault swung back on its hinges a skeleton, with an enormous rattle, fell into the arms of the gentleman. It was the skeleton of his first wife, and inter search disclosed all the dreadful details.

The unfortunate lady had evidently been only in a prolonged swoon. As a broken coffin lay on the floor of the vault it was presumed that, on waking up and finding where she was, she had struggled violently and caused the coffin to fall off the shelf, on which it had been placed, on to the floor.

A large bone lay close by the skeleton, and with this she had evidently tried to attract attention by striking the roof of the vault. The oil in a lamp, left by a workman, had all been consumed by the poor creature. Exhausted by want of food, she had gradually sunk and died in total darkness.

SAVED BY KISSES.

The foregoing episode is somewhat gruesome, but we can now quote two examples followed by happier results. A young French lady, deeply in love with a student, was betrothed to another, an old beau, who had made his fortune by selling rags, that she would have to marry a friend of his, also a retired rag seller, whose son was similarly smitten by the young girl. On hearing this announcement she was seized with a violent illness, and in a few days supposed to be dead. She was buried in a shortish part not far from Paris.

On the same night the young student, frantic with grief and rage, formed the idea of unearthing her, possessing himself of her beautiful black hair, and then, after killing her father and the would-be bridegroom, drowning himself in the Seine. At dead of night he proceeded to the grave yard, disinterred the corpse, and was removing the inestimable lips with passionate kisses when he noticed that the slight exertion had quickened her circulation.

With rapt joy he bore her to the nearest house and applied restoratives with such success that she was completely recovered and was able to fly with him on the following day to Germany, where they were married.

CONSCIOUS THROUGH SCISSORS.

Electricity has been responsible for resuscitation when it was declared to be dead by the most expert medical authorities. A young German doctor, of fine physique and excellent health, was seized with an inscrutable illness and in a couple days was dead. He was buried in a ten foot grave.

Some friends of his, medical students, exercised doubts as to his demise, and resolved to experiment upon him with a very powerful electric battery.

With much difficulty and not they opened his grave, removed the body from the coffin and bore it hastily to their dissecting room. Hour after hour they spent in trying to resuscitate by electric stimulation. Scissors, electric shocks, and a dose of the grey stroke of dawn warned them that it was high time to replace the body in the grave.

One young student, however, begged for another minute, as he had a pet theory which he wished to try. Hastily making a gash, he applied the wire to a very sensitive nerve. Instantly the young doctor arose, staggered to the middle of the room and fell heavily to the floor.

Restoratives were applied, and soon the supposed corpse was able to relate his experience. He asserted that he had never been unconscious for an instant from the time the doctors had pronounced him "dead" to the time when the "pet theory" had produced such happy results. How awful his feelings and thoughts must have been we can imagine.—London Tit-Bits.

The Blue Danube.

Among the most important rivers in Europe is the Danube; in fact, it is the second river. It has a length of 1,700 miles, it and its tributaries drain a valley having an area of over 300,000 square miles. Many nations live along its banks and those of the rivers which flow into it, and nearly thirty dialects are spoken, from the south to its mouth. It rises in the Black forest to the north of Switzerland, and almost in sight of the Rhine. It then flows through Bavaria and Austria in its course, through Hungary, past Servia and Bulgaria, Roumania and Bessarabia, while tributaries flow in from Russia and Galicia on the south and Poland on the north, so that practically the valley of the Danube comprises the most important portion of eastern Europe.

It runs through the battle ground of civilization and savagery. Here the Romans contended with the Britons and the Huns, here the Greek empire strove to maintain its supremacy over the hordes of savage tribes which came down from the steppes of Russia; here for the space of a the east failed away, Charlemagne contended with savage tribes of semi Asiatic hordes in Europe from which the Turks for generation after generation, until by a great battle fought under the walls of Vienna the flood of the Mohammedan invasion was rolled back toward Asia.—New York Ledger.

Terrible Loss of Life from Earthquakes.

In 1693 the isles of Sicilia and Malta suffered terribly from an earthquake, losing about 60,000 to 70,000 people. Jedda was again visited in 1866, but did not get off as easily as Sicilia, coming out of the wreck with 15,000 dead and missing. The greatest calamity of the century was the great eruption in Java in 1883, which is said to have killed not less than 120,000 persons.—St. Louis Republic.

An Ex-Police Reporter's Story.

"Some years ago," he said, "I was a night police reporter on one of the dailies of Chicago. I was ambitious, and it was my delight above all things to catch the early star which for some mysterious rate that he was not ready to give away. I remember one of the stages upon which he is a member of the city somewhat antic-pated. He seemed surprised to see me, and I was surprised to see him.

"'Ah, there!' says I, in a manner quite as mysterious as that employed by himself.

"'Yer here' says he.

"'I am, every time,' says I.

"'Then there was a lull. 'Fonny,' says he, 'how you reporters get on to every thing that we fellows are up to.'

"'That's all right,' says I. 'We know our business.'

"'What do you know about this case?' he asked.

"'I don't remember my exact answer, but it was couched in such language as I thought would convince him that I knew what I was talking for. We talked on some other for several minutes, when he finally proposed a compromise.

"'Says he: 'Well, seeing that you are on to me, tell me what you know about this case and I'll tell you what I know.' Up and up.'

"'That goes,' says I.

"'Done,' says he.

"'Well,' says I, 'to be honest about it, I don't know a damned thing. Now I want you to keep your word with me.'

"Then he took me down the street and turned into a dark alley and went around behind an ash barrel and yet his finger to his nose.

"'Hi,' says he.

"'Hi,' says I, putting my finger to my nose.

"'You won't give it away?' says he.

"'Cross my heart,' says I.

"Then he said in a whisper: 'I live just around the corner, and I was going down to the shoemaker's to get my shoes half soled.' Just he looked at me.

"Then I went back into back into the street and into a cigar store, and told the man to give my friend the best Hiram ever cigar in his case. I guess that was the first cigar that was ever sold for fifteen cents in that section of the city."—Chicago Tribune.

Bismarck's Motto.

It is said that Bismarck, when a young man, starting low at Potsdam, never for get his rank and importance, and was careful to preserve what he considered his rights. One day he chid in her mistress, with whom he had business, appeared to forget him, and Bismarck recalled his wandering attention by drumming on the window sill.

At another time he thought he was kept waiting in the anteroom altogether too long. On being at last asked his errand, he replied, "I came to ask for leave, but now I apply for dismissal!"

In spite of his haughtiness in regard to his own rank and prerogatives, he was of a generous character, he was absent invariably kind and thoughtful to his inferiors in social position. When very young, he at wage cannot be take just the rude stuff with servants and those under his command, and they always loved him, though his demeanor was grave and stern.

At one time, when he and his brother were managing and overseeing the Prussian estates, Bismarck secretly rejoiced at a certain pound land owner for his neglect and stubbornness. The young man in ex cuse said that he had not a penny of cash for agriculture, and was tired of farming.

"I have struggled with my dollar a long time," concluded the unwilling farmer.

"Not yet long enough!" answered Bismarck dryly.

This story brought the young man to his senses. He continued the struggle, overcame his difficulties, and became a capital farmer, and today remembers thankfully Bismarck's "Not yet long enough!"

This saying, by the way, has been connected with the name of Bismarck since often times by a pleasant proverb, which begins, "Not yet long enough," says Bismarck," and goes on, connecting other sayings with the names of different influential families.—Youth's Companion.

Cannibalism in Hayti.

The Haytians term the sacrifice of a human victim the offering of "the goat without horns," a euphemism for what we can find many parallels. Louisiana is, fortunately, free from this horrible taint, but there are instances of concern drives by St. John there can be no doubt that the cannibalism of young people, generally girls, is not uncommon in Hayti. Probably of a recent occurrence is the case of a French priest in the district of Arcahaye in 1869. This man had persuaded some of his parishioners to offer up a young negro, and to take him to witness the rude ceremonies. All went on in the manner that has already been described till after the sacrifice of a white goat and fowl, when a young man came and knelt before the queen and said: "Oh, mamam, I have a favor to ask. Give me, to complete the sacrifice, the goat with out horns."

The queen gave a sign of assent, the crowd in the shed separated and there was a shrill outcry with the knife. In an instant a rope, silently passed through a block, was tightened, the child's feet flew up toward the roof, and the long cut preached it with a knife. The head stock gives to the victim around the Frenchmen to the truth of what was really going on. The child, dazed, "the goat the child" and would have rushed forward, but he was seized and hurried from the spot by his friends. There was a short pursuit, but they succeeded in reaching the town and in return the police to hasten to the place. They would, however, on nothing sight of the French priest, accompanied him to the scene of sacrifice and found the remains of the feet and the head of the child.—Hon. Maj. A. B. Ellis in Popular Science Monthly.

Dipsomania.

I have heard quite a number of inquiries in Boston as to the meaning of the word "Dipsomania," which Brooklyn's Four Hundred have adopted as the title of one of their most select associations. I have heard it claimed that the word is Greek, also Indian. I learn from Simon B. Chandoden that it comes from the vocabulary of the new defunct Lower Island Indians. "Dipsomania," he tells me, "is Indian for a candy cliff. It therefore applies to the Brooklyn heights, and has been selected by the members of the Brooklyn Club as being the name for one of its most prosperous social organizations, whose main object is to give a ball once a year."—New York Star.

The Romantics or Withering Wind.

The name of Jacmatian has been given a periodical wind which blows from the interior of Africa toward the Atlantic ocean during the three months of December, January and February. It sets in with a fog or dry haze which continues round the sun for whole weeks together. Every plant, bit of grass and leaf in its course is withered as though it had been seared by heat from a furnace; often within an hour after it begins to blow green grass is dry enough to burn like paper. Even the hardened natives lose all of the skin on exposed parts during the prevalence of this withering wind.—St. Louis Republic.

TAMING WILD BIRDS.

Feathered Creatures Are as Susceptible to Kindness as Human Beings.

When young I found many wild birds, and as the time is coming for their mating and busy season for building and rearing their young it may give some bird fanciers pleasure to explain the method by which I was perfectly successful.

I wanted the cost of such as I desired to get could be very large, for some did seem to lose heart and sit sullenly in fly in an open cage. I then borrowed the best cockatoo, put it in a tight cage near the bird with a large screen from which it might be convenient for the parent bird to feed them. The cage should be long to come to a place, Finally I found I had to get two birds, on a case of birds, out of the reach of cats.

At first the old birds are shy, and seem to lose their disappointment by rapidly assisted and working in hard winter, as I never found them to desert their offspring, but I was always careful to see that they begin to feed them, too, with a little sweet biscuit, berries, seeds and worms or some green stuff. The old birds showed them for a time. Finally they learn to say name. There is a curious fact about this, after they find their young remember the old birds perfectly. It is not so, as I have noted it thoroughly. After removing the cage to the house, the old birds leaving about their nest, I fed them in the usual way, paying little attention to the young ones and carefully giving them fresh water for frequent bathing.

I once found a pet yellow bird, a lively little fellow and common, about the size of a canary and almost similar in color. The plumage of the male was of a bright yellow, lower part of the body, and the plumage of the female was more of a bluish yellow. They build their nests in hollow trees, and I found one of the pair, I know, together, and lined inside with some soft substance. They were very timid around the house, as they generally are when in a cage, and very shy.

I learned to have confidence in giving them their liberty by accident. One harvest day another came out to the field and I found it was a young bird, just had been caged from the cage, which I had set in the window of an upper room. I came to the house feeling sad, as a child would, and found my bird perched in the opposite branch of a high pear tree, gravely enjoying its freedom. Presenting a biscuit from my pocket, I called to it, and it came down, stopping sometimes as it turned its head and scrutinized in a manner.

To my surprise it flew down, perched upon my shoulder, fed from the biscuit, and allowed me to put it in the cage again. After that I gave it liberty. Nothing delighted it much as to perch on my shoulder and fly to my finger, by my shoulder and manifest its great delight by stroking, ruffling its feathers, spreading its wings in an animal pleasure, and working its little bill to be kissed like a pouting child.

I had it in the shop one day, hopping about on the floor, when I was called to it, but remained only to whisper into another bird, on my shoulder and died in my hands. I buried it lovingly back of the barn, with a pen for a head-stone.—Nature's Realm.

Tallyrand Meets Bonaparte.

I had never seen him. As already mentioned, he had written to me on the occasion of my appointment as minister of foreign affairs—a kind of congratulatory letter, in which he evidently intended I should discover a difficult man from the one he had written above to himself on the stage of public affairs. On the very day of his arrival in Paris he sent me an audience to inquire as what time he could see me. I replied that I was at his disposal; he sent word that he would call on me at 11 o'clock the next morning. At that I informed Mme. de Staël, who the following morning at 10 o'clock was in my drawing room. There were also present several other persons brought by curiosity. I mention this distinguishing fact because it was among them. The general being announced I went to meet him. As we crossed the drawing room I introduced Mme. de Staël to him, but he hardly paid any attention to her, he noticed only Bonaparte, to whom he addressed some pleasant words.

At first sight he struck me as a charming figure; the lassitude of twenty centuries seemed to be wanting to youth, a handsome eye, a fair complexion and a certain tired look. He was in a very simple dress, but everyone then was, on his side, without reserve. He refreshed with much courtesy the same compliment to the ministry, and had expressed on the occasion to had felt on corresponding in France with a person of a different stamp from the directory.

Then, with scarcely any transition, he said to me, "You are a nephew of the archbishop of Rheims, who is with Louis XVIII." (I noticed that on this occasion he did not say "with the Lords of Louis.") "I, too," he added, "have an uncle who is an archbishop in Corsica. It is he who gave me my first lessons. In Corsica, you know, being an archbishop is the same as being a bishop in France."

We soon returned to the drawing room, which was now full, and he said aloud: "Citizens, I feel deeply the greeting you accord me. I have done my best where serving the interests of the state, and I have always been, and shall be, a friend of peace." It is for the directory to see how to turn my efforts to profit for the happiness and prosperity of the republic."

Then he bowed and we bowed together to the directory.—Tallyrand's Memoirs in Century.

Husband Saved, but Umbrella Lost.

A man and his wife rushed across the street in front of a horse car, and the ground being covered with frozen ice the man slipped and fell on the track. The horses were coming along at a sharp trot, and it looked as though the poor man would be run over. The wife screamed and ran out in the middle of the street to help her husband, but he would surely be run over. His wife screamed, and the driver shut down on the brake with might and main and pulled the horses apart, the front one on which the man lay. When the car came to a standstill the front platform was near the man and the wheel almost touched him.

The man was so frightened that he crawled out of his dangerous position with difficulty. His wife immediately fell to sweeping his materials with him, and it was run over and broken in two when the car started. There was a little feeling when she saw that her husband was saved but one of the greatest joy, but as soon as she discovered that he had allowed his umbrella to be run over she changed to anger.

"You fool, you!" she exclaimed, "aren't you ever with anything being killed with out going and having your umbrella run over? Can't you, you, enough was to fall down in front of a car?"

She went on in this strain until she said her husband went out of hearing. The poor fellow looked at the lady that he had escaped the car wheels only to meet a worse fate, and the man who witnessed the incident exclaimed, "Darn your umbrella, it saved his life!"—New York Tribune.

Happiness Followed.

"I am going to be your bride," said the young carriage builder from Boston as they stood before the altar.

"Yes," said his blushing bride, who intended always to have the last word, "and I will supply the spokes."

"And I," second up the clergyman as he joined both the hands, "am the tire."—St. Joseph News.
