UTAH'S CROPS AND FINANCES.

As far as the general condition of affairs throughout the state is concerned, the yield for 1895 has been satisfactory in most particulars. In some localities the peculiar weather of last spring caused delays and losses, but these were mostly made up in other ways, so that in grain, hay and vegetables the production generally has made a very acceptable average. From the scientific in the amount of stored hay last spring there may not be so much of this crop on hand as there was a year ago, and in some localities prices may rule a little higher on this account than for some time past; but the present supply is not at all inadequate to the demand, so there will be no shortage. In one particular, the fruit crop, there has been a heavy falling off, and quite a burden will be entailed on some localities and classes in consequence.

From the standpoint of having a sufficiency of food generally, for man and animals, the showing is fairly satisfactory; there is no denying that it would have been better if the fruit yield had been up to the usual standard. Yet taken altogether there is little to complain of and very much to be thankful for. Of one thing there is assurance, viz.: that there is no necessity for any deserving person to suffer for the actual necessities of life, though there will be many who cannot afford the luxuries and must be economical in utilizing the comforts thereof.

One fact that has to be considered and which substitutes an effective barrier against extravagance in most families, is the low prices that come to the producer under existing circumstances. The cause and cure of such conditions are matters of extensive discussion; its existence is plainly apparent, and a duty of providers for families is to wrestle with that condition as it is. They cannot sit in idleness till theoretical or even demonstrated remedies are applied in the slow order that attends disputed policies. For the people of the State there is but one road to safety in their business and household expenses, and that is right economy, intelligently applied.

There are very many people burdened with debt; and it might be superfluous to suggest the advisability of getting out from under the load as quickly as possible, for the reason that such a course would be adopted if it were available. But the admonition may be ventured that no further indebtedness be incurred where it possibly can be avoided, and that those who are out of debt remain so, at least till matters are in a more settled condition.

The financial stringency of 1893 brought home many, and sometimes painful, lessons of economy to people who had been too extravagant or venturesome in their business affairs; and the experiences since that time should not be without value now. However bright the prospect might appear in the near future, it must be admitted that there is an interior which might not prove pleasant if unwisdom should abound. The present increasing stringency of the money market, which is naturally connected with the expressed intimation of certain financial forces in the land to precipitate another panic, indicates that such a condition can be safely avoided only by care and prudence on the part of the people themselves.

The present situation is such that it is only necessary to make the merest suggestion in order to attract attention thereto and demonstrate the wisdom of caution and conservatism in these matters. With the standing the people of this State have for integrity in financial affairs, and their well known ability to weather business storms successfully through their willingness to aid and their confidence in each other, whatever adversity might come would touch them more lightly than any other part of the Union. With the goodly supply of the necessaries of life that we have on hand, and the exercise of ordinary prudence in business affairs, public and domestic, there ought to be no occasion for special worry, though there is abundant reason to keep "a level head."

SENATOR THURSTON'S RETRACTION

It is scarcely the proper thing to continue the attack on Senator Thurston after he has made the amends honorable and done all that a gentleman can do to set matters right yet some of our contemporaries seem to be not yet satisfied and are disposed to let the incident dress have to publication. As the News looks at it, Mr. Thurston felt into a very natural error, one that perhaps nine out of ten men situated as he is would have fallen into. He is a partisan, entirely engaged in the dissemination of his party's principles and seeking to promote the political interests of its candidates; he is then, by the very force of circumstances, intent upon obtaining matter for his speeches that will be favorable to his own side and unfavorable to the opposition—for politics, like war, consists of offensive as well as defensive movements. Being a reader of newspapers and finding what he considered legitimate ammunition in the columns of a paper professing the same general political tenets as Mr. Bryan, he appropriated and made use of the matter in a manner with which the public are already familiar. It is by no means a justification for giving circulation to a falsehood that the circulator read it in a presumably reliable paper; that is, it is not a legal justification, for the reason that such person is held to be as amenable after the fact and equally guilty with the author of the wrong; but morally considered and in the light of all the existing facts, a prompt acknowledgement coupled by all the reparation that can be made should surely amount to exculpation.

This reminds us that the prisoners in alone and wilderness, amounting at times to bled and slander, does not seem to diminish greatly with the passing of the years, especially at times when there is a political campaign on. The practice is decried in the best circles and is wilfully resorted to nowadays by those who, on a rule, are not considered of the head of the list; but still, it is not done by any means. This is not saying that Senator Thurston is in that class; the manner in which he made his retraction after the error was brought home to him shows that he is not, even if there were no other evidence.

MAX O'RELL AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Paul Blouet, or Max O'Rell as he is known in the literary world, does not seem to be getting on so smoothly as he did. He has said some very witty things, but latterly has been indulging his humor at the expense of his veracity and has not been as courteous in his choice of subjects as the proverbial Frenchman. Literary folk will remember that a couple of years ago Blouet perpetrated a joke at the expense of the gullible-seeking element in Americans. It was responded to rather coarsely by Mark Twain, who was taken to task for not observing the point of the O'Rell witticism and letting it pass by. But now others are noting the trend of the Frenchman's jokes, and in a way to show that the American humorist, while processing at an inopportune time to rebuke Blouet, had a pretty good insight into his way of doing business.

One of the recent bits of supposed humor by Max O'Rell has been his North American Review article on female suffrage. In unpalatal fashion he made women voters the butt of ridicule. In writing on "political government," the Frenchman said he "knew of one country only where the government by women was given a real trial, and that is New Zealand. The law was passed and the experiment was made. The law had to be repealed after six months. The government had taken such a tyrannical sway that the liveliest of spots on the earth was on the eve of a revolution, and a desperate struggle for liberty."

This statement was allowed to go uncharged for a time, but its reproduction in leading journals caused a prominent London newspaper, the Daily News, to take the matter up, and to give Max O'Rell a warning up because of his disregard of truth. After paying attention to him for his apparently deliberate misstatement of facts, it says that female suffrage, granted in New Zealand three years ago, is not more likely to be revoked there than it was by ballot to be repealed in England. It adds that indeed the absence of expressions of discontent with it is remarkable; that the fact seems to be that female suffrage has been quietly accepted in the colony as a recognized institution. It has also been established in South Australia and it is worthy of note that in both colonies the effect of the admission of women voters was to confirm in power previously existing, and very radical, administrations.

A few more incidents of this kind, and Max O'Rell's willingness will lose their point because he assumes imaginary conditions on which to base his observations, instead of displaying the genius of the true humorist by seeking his foundation that which actually exists.

POWER OF THE PEOPLE.

When Li Hung Chang visited Prince Bismarck he asked the latter how a minister could carry out intended reforms in a country, and received the reply that a regular army was necessary for that purpose.

If the story is authentic, the statement may be regarded as a little out of a social let out in a curious manner, for it is undoubtedly true that the German statesman and all belonging to the Bismarckian school look upon the standing service as the supports of the thrones rather than as the bulwarks of nations. For years and years the representatives of the people have been implored to make the appropriations in money and sacrifices innumerable for the purpose of creating and maintaining armies. In all the historical displays, patriotism was appealed to. They were needed, it was said, for the defense of country and home, against other nations. Diplomatic intrigues were sprung to demonstrate the danger of not having a standing army. But those who manipulated the scheme all the time had in view to wring from the people a means whereby to secure the existence of the dynasties and their friends in power. When that object is attained, the army is no longer the people's. It is, in the words of a monarch, "my army," "my soldiers." They are not worth not to be loyal to the country in the first place, but to the king. Bismarck was right. The militarism of Europe is a rod whereby to beat the nations into submission to such "rulers as" as rulers may find it to their advantage to navigate.

It is of interest, therefore, to notice the outcome of the several struggles now going on between regular armies and people in arms. It would seem as if the times when rulers who depend on soldiers rather than on the love of the people for their positions may find themselves disappointed some day.

In Cuba Spain's regular soldiers have now for a year or more hopelessly fought the people. There are hardly a million and a half inhabitants, all told. The Spaniards have 200,000 soldiers on the island and a fleet on the coasts. The Cubans are but ill equipped. Yet the Spanish generals are making no appreciable headway.

On Crete the conditions is about the same. Twenty thousand Turkish regular soldiers have now for half a year in vain endeavored to suppress the insurrection among the population numbering perhaps 300,000 souls. True enough, the sultan's soldiers are no patterns of military skill, but as compared to the Cretan people they are formidably armed and well drilled. Yet it would probably require more than 100,000 Turks to master the situation on that little island in the Mediterranean.

But Italy's experience in Abyssinia is a still more pointed lesson in the same direction. Her army is well equipped and drilled according to all modern rules, and yet before the half-barbarian hordes of King Menelik they were scattered as chaff before the wind.

The real power is in the hands of the people all the world over. A people in arms for a cause believed to be just is generally invincible. True enough, in the German-French struggle Gambetta's army did not stand before Moltke's iron regiments. But neither did Napoleon's regular army. But then the French people were not united, as later events demonstrated. Had there been unity history might have recorded another result of that greatest of modern wars.
