WRITTEN EVIDENCE.

"Mr. Wingrove, you have talked about Claire?"

"No, and I don't mean—that is, how is she?"

"Don't you ever speak of her?"

"Never, on my honor."

"Or think of her?"

"As little as possible."

"Oh!"

"My dear Mrs. Kingston, this is scarcely reasonable. Of course, I feel a great deal of—respect for your daughter, and you, no doubt, are anxious to know if that other fellow, and I want to the cage. I think he only to forget you in time, but to forget me is—well. That was the only thing Kitty Wren's fault."

"Did you succeed?"

"No answer."

"Have you spoke together, Mr. Wingrove?"

"Well—of course—that is—yes?"

"Then why have you come to me me?"

"Because we are old friends, Dorothy, for that you were in my view when I was a student at Heidelberg. Your husband was a boon to me at a time, and I have needed good deal of kindness, and when she jilted you, and I began to love her I don't know whether you are here thinks were going, but you were so good and helpful that my time then was the best and happiest I have ever known. And then, when it all turned out wrong and everything seemed going round, you stood by me and shouted me, and I got through somehow."

"I was so sorry for you, poor boy."

"You favoured me then good to me, and, though you know there I'm nothing to boast of, it is better now for you I don't know where I should have broken. And last night I forgot those things, Mrs. Kingston, thought of the time I was so good to me, understood them. So I'm glad to be back with you again after the three years, and I'm sitting here you all about myself, just as you used to let me."

"Yes, it seems good and comfortable. Go on just as you like."

(Wingrove goes for ten minutes, after which there is a silence. Then Mrs. Kingston speaks with apparent indifference.)

"By the way, Mr. Wingrove, do you still care for Claire?"

"Mrs. Kingston, what a question!"

"No reply?"

"Really—but, long is all—you mustn't ask me that. It isn't right—indeed it isn't."

"Don't you know? Didn't they ever tell you? She's a widow, Mr. Wingrove."

"Claire a widow! But how? When?"

"Hedlof more than a year ago, following the wounded. It was so sad."

"And I have been in Africa all this time without knowing a word about it! Poor, poor Claire! I don't care who knows it now—I may speak. I love her, just as much as ever, and, by Jove, she need marry me. Claire live!"—

"Hush, Mr. Wingrove. I am very sorry I spoke about it, but I thought—I hoped—you had really forgotten her. Oh, why did you come back just at this moment! Claire is not free."

"I—oh I—understand."

"She is going to marry Sir John Moreville. He was one of your friends, you will remember, and, thought I knew I think she ever liked him in the way she did you, he pleaded so hard and was so devoted that at last she took him. You know what an extraordinary fascination she has over men. Ever since I can remember, even when she was the merest schoolgirl, they have some round her like moths, to look at her and hear her talk. There is something magnetic about her, I suppose, but where she goes it from."—

"Was known better than I how hopeless by irresistible she is? But never mind that now. What I want to know is why didn't you or somebody let me know what had happened and give me another chance. I know she liked me better than Moreville. He often told me so. After all that there was between us, was it fair or kind to leave me sticking out there while he had everything his own way here? Half a word would have brought me back, and then I would have told her that everything was just the same with me, and that I loved her as much as ever. I've tried to forget her and have failed miserably, and now—(Hitts his head in his hands.) It wasn't kind—indeed it wasn't."

"But, my dear boy, how could we write to you after that letter you wrote?"

"Yes? In heaven's name, what was?"

"Can you have forgotten?"

(Opens an envelope and produces a manuscript.)

It you are true, as I am sure you are true
Then what shall be between us pain,
But if you are false, then I pray my God
And to make my passion be vain,
For then I vow, by all most dear,
I will not give you one poor tear,
One moment's thought, nor slight regret,
But bless in silence—forget.

"Mr. Kingston, tell me how it seems to me that this cold, jingle prevented you from writing to me?"

"You signed it, Mr. Wingrove."

"Signed it! I've signed a thousand little things that might never to be made binding on me. Why I was about to write to you when I saw the letter, and I felt that I could not. Claire was a mere schoolgirl, and I was a boy. Are such as all boys write when they're in love for the first time, which ought to be saved to either and turned by the numbers being man. She can't have believed in it."

"Oh, did, though, and so did I. You were always so serious to what you said and did. I remember her telling me you had given it to her and that she felt quite certain that if, after all, she did not marry you, you would never come near her or think kindly of her again."

"Oh, but women are impossible. When you tell them all day long that you love them, they will believe you, and then they go and put all their faith in a person who lot of power like this (Throws it scarcely into the fire.) There. It's done its mischief. Let it burn. But tell Claire that I have been the happiest man in the world, and now—

"My poor, poor boy, I am so sorry for you. What will you do?"

"Oh, let me go away. I am too vagrant of fortune's kicks."—Black and White.

A Hot Bath Will Bring Sleep.

Suppose a person be tired out by every work of any kind, tired so much, fretfully and worn, to be absolutely unable to sleep, or sleep only during the hours in unhappy wakefulness. He will know the condition of the body and mind. Turn on the hot water in the bathroom and sit in the hot bath until the drowsy feeling comes, which will be within three minutes, rub yourself briskly with a coarse Turkish towel, to the point of feeling very dry and then go to bed. You will enjoy the sleep of the just and rise to the morning wondering how you could have felt so bad. If the night before you had taken a cold bath your eyes from a sleepless night. If not from a severe headache the next day.—The Cyrus Edson in Ladies' Home Journal.

Making Seed Potatoes.

Here is the story of soaking seed potatoes in a solution of corrosive sublimate to prevent rot, as lately told by The Rural New Yorker: Dissolve 2 ounces of corrosive sublimate in a wooden tub, using 2 gallons of water, add this liquid to 14 gallons of water, and stir it well. Wash the potatoes, put them in a sack or like when basket and lower them into the liquid. Let them soak for minutes, lift out, drain dry, and cut for seed. Seed that is very dirty may be washed in clean water. The fallow soaked in corrosive sublimate and planted in clean ground are remarkably free from rot. It planted in ground that had in year for potatoes that were affected by the rot, this treatment would not be sufficient.

Written Evidence For Hire.

"Who's that queer looking young man? asked the visitor as we left Brentwood.

"Oh, he's a young man—he's a fellow the Brentwood people employ. He's feeling mighty proud these days."

"What about?"

"He's going to hire to a life-writer to legalize his friendship—The Great Shoe-peen Cipher."

"It can do?"

"Yes—Feather-bites the part of the lighter."—Boston Journal.
