LI HUNG CHANG.

Extracts from Correspondence Describing Shooting of Li Hung Chang.

[New York Commercial.]

The following extracts from the private correspondence of a gentleman who accompanied Li Hung Chang on his new famous trip to Japan for the purpose of negotiating the treaty of peace between China and Japan, are well worth reading, and are peculiarly interesting at the time when our peace commissioners are returning from a successful negotiation of their negotiations with Spain. The communication was written at Tientsin on May 4, 1895:

History is being made very fast out here, and I cannot hope to keep up with it in my letters. We had a pleasant voyage from here to Japan, the two vessels carrying the ambassador's flag, and with his staff of over 20 officials, guards and servants, we made quite a party. There were his son, Lord Li, and a high officer named Ma, who was educated in Paris and took the degree of bachelor of arts there.

"We lived for a month in a temple at Shimonoseki (Japan), which is, or was, a picturesque little town on the west coast of Japan, at the entrance of the beautiful Inland Sea. Our temple, specially fitted up for us by the Japanese government, was a dusty little place, none of its buildings surrounded by gardens laid out in that quaint and delightful miniature imitation of nature, for which the Japanese are so clever, and also trees in blossom, flowers, ponds and queer-shaped rocks covered with moss and ferns. Every prospect pleases and only man is vile, for they shot the viceroy one day in the street as he was returning from a meeting in his residence. A quiet looking little Jap, who was standing among the spectators of the procession, suddenly pulled a small American (Smith & Wesson's) revolver out of his sleeve and fired at the viceroy's face, about 4 feet off. The bullet struck some pads on the viceroy's left eye, smashed the glass of his spectacles and penetrated his head nearly 2 inches, and is there yet, for the surgeons could not find it. Though they probed long and often, they all agreed that it would be better to leave the bullet where it was rather than perform a long and painful operation to find it. The viceroy is 74, too old for the shock and loss of blood attending such an operation as would have been necessary. The Japanese emperor and his government were much alarmed. The premier (count Ito, whom the viceroy had just left before the shooting and many other ministers and all the local military officers hastily called and expressed regret and sympathy, and hundreds of telegrams of condolence were received from all over Japan. The emperor sent 20 men to answering them—addresses from communities, corporations and individuals. There were over 200 of them. The emperor and his own doctors to attend the viceroy, and the emperor sent his lady nurses and bandages of linen made by his own hand.

"The only foreigners with the viceroy were the Hon. J. W. Foster, of Washington, secretary of state under President Harrison, who came out as political adviser to the Chinese government; his private secretary, Dr. Depasse, a French physician, and myself. Now of us had gone out with the viceroy that day. I was the only foreigner present when he was carried into the temple in a fainting condition, blood pouring down his face and neck. Dr. Lin, the viceroy's Chinese doctor (educated in the United States) and I were sitting on my veranda waiting for his return and wondering at the delay, and we saw the Japanese rush to his assistance and put him out of his chair, carried out by handkerchief and gave it to the doctor, who took and it to stop the blood and dress the scalp wound and the handkerchief was soon soaked and dripping with blood. We laid him on a lounge, and I then hurried off to find the French doctor, and luckily found him at his day and so got back together. Then Japanese doctors came and for a long time there was great excitement and consternation, as the wound was found to be very deep, the ball could not be reached by any instruments, and it was feared that the wound was fatal and death might occur at any moment. There was great confusion in the streets, too, and we were all expecting an attack upon the temple to destroy the whole of us. 100 soldiers and police soon came, surrounded the temple, drove the mob away and cleared the streets. It was an anxious time for us with the viceroy, as we then thought, dying, and the mob likely to break in and finish us at any time during the night, seeing that the viceroy was hearing it well, decided to stop searching for the bullet, and let the wound heal, and trust to time to begin to improve matters. He showed wonderful fortitude and consciousness from first to last. He could hardly keep him quiet in his bed, he insisted on attending to public business and dictating from his bed, and he sent for reporters while his head was a huge mass of bandages covering one eye and nose, the eye and left cheek. He was dictating dispatches, correcting drafts, discussing with his advisers, receiving visitors and keeping his wits wonderfully at work day and night. Many of his office sat up writing or translating all night after a day's work, with a short interval for sleep. Telegraphing was going on rapidly between the viceroy and the emperor at Peking, and in this was added a great flow of telegrams of condolence after the shooting. The viceroy's telegraph bill in Japan was 2,000 yen ($1,000) and in Pekin nearly for telegrams sent, in one month was $25,000.

"As a precaution against attacks by assassins at night, I organized a Chinese guard from sailors on our two steamers and some of our own servants, armed them and stationed them in every doorway and passage all around the viceroy's house, and I went the rounds every night to see that every man was at his post with his loaded rifle and fixed bayonet. My authority there cannot be questioned.

"It was a month filled with excitement and interest, and the result of it all—the treaty—was a blow which China had to make great sacrifices to Japan—you have seen in the papers.

"My opinion is that Pekin and beneath peace to this wretched country. Immediately there was a great outcry from some ministers in Pekin, generally of previous and generous agents the hard terms of the treaty, and for a long time it was doubtful whether the treaty would be ratified by the emperor. But at last it was done—two days after—and the viceroy left for Pekin with Chinese officers to exchange the ratified treaty with the Japanese ministry who came to Chefoo for the purpose. Already the Japanese have actually satisfied by the Japanese emperor.

"And so peace has come, and the viceroy and his staff have left Japan, and the Japanese demands were very largely reduced because of the murderous attack, for Japan is now recognized before the world. You will remember that the present emperor of Russia was nearly killed by a Japanese when he was traveling in Japan several years ago, and within eight years two Japanese subjects of state have been assassinated and another nearly so, and for the enhancement of this bloodthirsty spirit among certain classes of the people the government of Japan probably plead no responsibility.

"However, it is all over now. 'All's well that ends well.'"
