DESERET EVENING NEWS.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1894.

DETAINED AS PRISONERS.

Two Children, Wards of Mormon Elders, Not Allowed to Land.

They are Held for Board a Steamer Pending an Investigation, but are Finally Released.

An Associated Press dispatch appeared in the News on Friday, the 23rd, indicating the arrival in San Francisco, on the steamer Mariposa, of a party of Mormon missionaries en route to Utah from Samoa, and that "traveling with them is the steerage were a little girl and a little boy, aged 8 and 11 years respectively, who are still detained on board the steamer. The local commissioner of immigration refuses to allow the Elders to take them. The children, who are white, are from the Samoan islands. The Elders claim to have been given custody of the children by their parents. They say it was their intention to educate the little ones at Salt Lake. However this may be, the local authorities threaten to send the children back to Samoa."

Further details of the case are given in the San Francisco Examiner as follows:

Two little children from the South Sea Islands are practically prisoners in charge of United States officials, and their prison for the present is the steamer Mariposa.

Commissioner of Immigration Hawley is their prison-keeper, and he will not be able to release them until instructions are received from the state department at Washington.

The two little tots who are prisoners are William Kennison and Rachel Hines, and their ages are 11 and 8 years respectively. The boy comes from Samoa and the girl from one of the Friendly Islands. They made the journey under the care of two Mormon missionaries, who have had been relieved of their mission in the South Seas and are returning to their homes at Salt Lake City, but information has been received from the American consul at Apia to the effect that the missionaries were fraudulently securing the possession of native children to take to America for some unknown reason; correspondence to that effect has been going on between the American representative at Apia and the state department for several months and that authorities here are notified to watch for any children in the custody of the missionaries and detain them pending an investigation.

It seems from the official correspondence that the American consul's attention was first called to the actions of the missionaries on the islands by several residents there who claimed that the Mormons were attempting to secure the children of the poorer and more ignorant natives of the islands to bring to America with the avowed purpose of educating them.

For what reasons these overtures were made to the natives is not quite clear, but it is supposed that it was the intention to get the parents of the children to follow them to Utah and to establish a colony in the Mormon settlement in America of South Sea islanders.

The consul in his letters openly charged that the missionaries were paying some of money for the children and when he learned that two little tots had been secured by the Mormon Elders he promptly notified his government, and the children were detained on their arrival in port.

The children are exceptionally bright and intelligent and they were the pets of the passengers of the steamer all the way from their far-off home. They regretfully parted from their ocean friends when the gangplank was lowered and they looked wistfully on while their fellow-passengers went ashore and wondered why they should not be allowed to follow them and see the wonderful sights of the great city that they had heard so much of while on the way up from the far away and lonely islands.

The boy, William Kennison, is in charge of an Elder named A. Twitchell, who, upon being questioned by the commissioner of immigration, said that the boy's parents were both dead, and that he had written guarantee papers, but afterwards admitted that the boy's parents were living, and that he had only received verbal consent to take charge of the boy until he should receive an education in the schools of America.

Twitchell said that Elder W. D. Hunter, and he thought he had documentary evidence that he was right to have the guardianship of the child. In view of these circumstances the commissioner has decided to thoroughly investigate the matter before allowing the Mormon Elders to depart with the children from the steamer.

Elder Hunter on being questioned said that the boy's parents are living. They went to Samoa many years ago from British Columbia and that they were English residents. Their children consequently are British subjects and not necessarily natives as the commissioner wished to infer. The father is a wealthy shipbuilder and the owner of a trading schooner that commands a good trade in the South Sea islands. The boy was one of a family of thirteen and the parents were anxious that he should receive a good education in the American schools. He took advantage of the kindness of the returning Mormon Elders and sent the boy with them under the promise that he would be properly taken care of and returned sufficient money for his maintenance and the expenses he would incur while under tuition.

The girl Rachael Giles was the daughter of an Englishman who married a native woman, and according to the law of the Friendly Islands she was a British subject. Her father is a well-to-do merchant, and he, like the shipbuilder, was anxious to give his daughter an education in a modern school and sent her to America in charge of Elder Hunter, who promised to look after her welfare. He also advanced money to cover all the expenses of her education, and Mr. Hunter said that she, like the boy, were to be placed in the public schools of Salt Lake until such time as the parents saw fit to send for them.

The girl does not speak English, except a few words, but she is very bright and cheerful, and the Elders in whose care she was intrusted said she would make an apt pupil. He had already taught her numerous about the ways of America in her native tongue, and she seemed to look upon her Mormon Elder with much respect.

If it is shown that the Mormon Elders have no legal rights to the children in the investigation that is to follow, they will be sent back to their homes.

Word was received today that the children had been released by the special board of inquiry, and would arrive in Salt Lake City by this evening's train from the west.

THE COOKING CLASS.

Another Evening Devoted to the Subject of Bread-Making.

The all-important subject of bread-making was the theme of Mrs. Ewing's lecture before the cooking class Saturday evening. Besides making the loaves, rolls and soup sticks, Mrs. Ewing offered many practical suggestions about different brands of flour and kinds of yeast. The compressed yeast not only saves much labor, but has been pronounced by prominent chemists superior to brewers' yeast. When preparing for bread, break up the yeast cake and cover with cold water. Use a pint of warm milk, half of sweet milk and half of hot water; the temperature of the mixture should be about seventy-five degrees; add a teaspoonful of salt, and into the mixture of milk, water and salt stir the sifted flour; stir with a wooden spoon until the dough is stiff enough to take on the board and work with the palm of the hand. When the dough will work without sticking to the board or the hands, you may know you have enough flour and that it is sufficiently worked. Place the dough in a greased bowl to rise; let it stand in a place not warmer than seventy-five degrees for three hours; it is then ready to put in the pans. Divide the dough into as many parts as you want loaves and work alternately; it should stand about one hour after it has been placed in the pans, but the temperature of the place where the pans stand should not be warmer than that where the dough was first put to rise. Each time it is set to rise the dough should be brushed over with a little melted butter to prevent the formation of a crust. The temperature in the oven for baking should be from three hundred and seventy to three hundred and seventy-five degrees.

Graham bread is made in the same way as the white, except that two tablespoonfuls of sugar should be added.

Boston brown bread: Two cups of white meal, two cups of graham flour, two teaspoonfuls of salt, and three of soda, mix together; add one cup of molasses, three cups of sour milk, less cups if the milk is not very sour; beat the batter well, pour it into moulds or buckets, leaving space for it to swell; steam four hours. This bread will keep for several days, and when wanted it should be steamed for one hour.

Monday evening, Nov. 26th, the subject will be brown rolls.

Legal Tissues.

Denver had a large mass meeting Friday night. One of the speakers, leading business man of that city, Mr. Cosfords, says the News, "told of a visit to Salt Lake, where he attended a mass meeting of citizens at which there were 10,000 people present. He said that the people of Utah were loyal to Uncle and were reaching out for the trade which their sleepy neighbors were neglecting. Denver people, he said, were not sufficiently alive to the emergencies of the occasion and the manufacturers were selfish in their efforts to do anything calculated to help the whole people."

Gone to Washington.

Delegate Hawkins left for Washington over the Union Pacific this morning. The banquet tendered him by his party associates at the Knickerbocker on Saturday night was a largely attended and pleasant affair.

The funeral of the late Albert E. Porter, the unfortunate painter who met with fatal injuries from a fall while at the McCornick residence last week, was held from the undertaking parlors of Stevens & Sons this afternoon. UTAH CITIZEN HONORED.

Hon. George Q. Cannon Made Chairman of the Kansas Irrigation Convention.

A Hutchinson, Kansas, dispatch of the 23d last says: The second annual convention of the State Irrigation association convened here today. George Q. Cannon, one of the presidents of the Mormon Church, Utah, was elected chairman for today's session. Committees were appointed and then short papers were read by practical irrigators from several Western Kansas counties. A large number of state politicians are present because legislation will be asked of the next Kansas legislature. Interest manifested in the movement is satisfactory to the promoters of the project. At least 1,000 farmers are attending. Exhibitions of machinery are far past expectations, machinery men having a profitable harvest for their pains. The convention will continue tomorrow night.
