JIMMY'S RESCUE.

Captain Mahen was a hard man with a soft spot. That soft spot was his friendship for little Jimmy Orear and he knew the winter when the child was lost in the Nevada sagebrush.

According to the price of view, the captain was the best man or the worst who ever boarded a railroad train in Nevada. Ask the leading entrepreneur and they would tell you that he was an A1 man, who could get more work out of his gang than any foreman on the line.

In December the camp contained about 40 men and teams, 1 woman and 2 children. The foreman's job not complete without including an old reckoned hose, a sort of camp follower, who updated on the leavings of the work mules. He was owned by Gregg, the boarding master, who with his wife administered beef, bacon, beans, potatoes, bread and coffee thrice a day to the 40 hungry men.

"I wonder," said the captain one day as he was disciplining the pickpockets for breaking into the feed corral, "why God Almighty ever made a horse when a mule is so much better every way. Now, a horse will break down if he doesn't have the best of feed, or go lame just when you want to reach the end. But you can rely on mules. Hard work and hard fare exactly suit them. They'll pull a scrape all day and be fresh enough at night to kick a driver. With a chance to roll over a couple of times when they quit work, and plenty of water to drink, they will never wear out. I never saw a mun that ever saw a mule die."

At this time camp was too idle from worse, since a spy plain carrying no vegetation but spares sagebrush and greasewood. Water was hauled in tank wagons, and the old horse, not getting all he needed in camp, had learned to follow the teams to the spring.

One morning, after the gang had breakfasted and gone to work on the grade, and repairs on the tank wagons could be dimly seen through their cows dust on the road to the spring, Gregg's little 3-year old son came out of the mess tent and crossed over to the corral, where he often played. The old horse was there, moving through the mangers, and the child presently climbed upon the backless wooden rubbing post and slipped on. The horse paid no heed to its little rider, and was nuzzled off up the road after the water wagons. The child held on tightly, at first laughing, then crying, until he had been carried several miles, when he fell off and wandered away from the road through the brush.

Jimmy was not missed until the mess came in from the grade for dinner. Then there was a hurried and unwilling search through the camp. After dinner Mahen held off ten teams and sent the drivers out to make a general search. By midafternoon he had reversed and reported failure. Meanwhile Mrs. Gregg, who said she was periodic sure Jimmy would not leave camp, had been through every tent and overhauled every bed roll, informing the same man for a joke had hidden the boy. Mahen now took the whole force of 40 men and joined in the quest. Under his direction both camp sides circled twice, each a distance of one mile, and every yard of the way carefully examined for footprints. None were found, and Mahen said to his man: "Now your work is cut out for you. Before dark you've got to lock under every brush inside of this line and you've bound to find him, for he could not get outside without making tracks."

This search also was, of course, fruitless. Force men came to camp at nightfall, others kept on searching along the plain all night, hoping to hear the child cry.

At daybreak the captain was in the saddle, mounted on his favorite mule. He still believed the boy must be inside the circle, if that had been properly made. To clear up that doubt he meant to make the entire round alone and outside of the line made by the men. To reach the starting point he rode out up the road toward the spring, his eyes on the ground, his mind on the problem of how Jimmy could get out of camp and leave no trail.

"By God, I've got it!" said he suddenly, jabbing both spurs into the mule, which responded with a gallant attempt to pitch him into a cactus bed. "That boy rode out on a water wagon. His mother is off her head in thinking he was in the tent when the wagons pulled out. He must have hung on to the tail of the last wagon, and lay low for fear the driver would kick him and send him back. After awhile he got sleepy and fell off, and I shall find his tracks somewhere in this road. Damnation! Why couldn't I think of that yesterday?"

The captain confidently urged his mule along at fast as a canter mule could be made to travel. And he confidence was justified by soon picking up the boy's trail at the point where he fell from the horse.

Abandoning now his mule, Mahen on foot followed the tortuous trail as rapidly as he could locate it. At times this was quick work. Again, on hard ground it was a slow and difficult search. Toward noon he entirely lost it on a rocky hill, and was delayed some hours. So that it was near night when he at last found the boy curled up beside a bush.

Jimmy was very much alive, but too cold to walk or talk. Mahen wrapped him in some of his own clothing and put a few drops of whisky in his mouth. Whisky straight was for strong a beverage for the child, and he choked. "Milk, milk!" he cried faintly.

Mahen had brought no food with him, and had nothing to offer him but whisky.

"Milk," said Jimmy again.

"All right," said Mahen, drawing a deep knife. "You shall have milk," and he turned a vein in his own arm, caught the flood in the cup of the whisky flask, added a little liquor, and gave the starving child a liberal draft. Jimmy was much astonished by the potion, and by midnight was safely home again and transferred from Mahen's to his mother's arms.

The boy was able next day to tell something about the adventure, but he explain him and always disputed the boy's story that he went out of camp on the back of old Barney.

"A horse is low down enough to do a trick like that," said he. "That a horse didn't do it this time. I tell you, I knew he went out on a mule, and I know the spot where he fell off." And that settled it.

"What does Jimmy mean by milk?" asks the great Gregg. "He says that when he fainted he was given blue milk to drink."

"He means whisky," said Mahen shortly.—Argonaut.

PIGEON BREEDING.

Notes Upon Nest Building, Breeding Rooms and Hatching.

The pairing of pigeons is over. Now look out for the breeding cages. Each nest pan should be provided with a layer of hay, because it is hygienic, but if possible to get it; pine, if the latter cannot be had. Some breeders give their pigeons no other material, but I believe it is better to strew pieces of hay, straw and twigs three or four inches in length about. They will delight them to collect and arrange for a nest, and although pigeons even in a state of nature build rough looking nests they will arrange the rough material in a manner that we could arrange it for them. Collecting this rough material keeps them busy, and there is less likelihood of disturbance where all are busy in this way than if the work was all done for them and they comparatively idle, for, as we have been often told, idleness is apt to induce disunion; therefore to prevent any prospect of discord it is best to keep them interested and busy.

The nest building is alternated with lovemaking, billing and cooing, calling and driving away the hen, who sits on till the first egg makes its appearance. Some fanciers who watch their birds carefully take the first egg away until the second is laid, which is about 36 hours after the first, believing that they are apt to hatch closer together if incubation begins with both at the same time, but my experience leads me to believe that the hen does not sit closely on the first egg, merely standing over it until the second is laid, when she settles down and covers both alike. During the period of incubation, which occupies about 16 to 18 days, the cocks assist the hens, they sitting during the day and the hens during the night.

Blue Leghorns.

The Blue Langshans are not popular fowls in this country, but in England they are highly favored. The subject of the illustration is a pair owned by a well known English fancier. The cock is a first and special prize winner and is considered the most perfect blue yet out. The pullet also won first prize at one of the English poultry shows.

Those Germs

YOU HEAR SO MUCH ABOUT GERMS that it may be somewhat startling to be reminded that they are all around you and within you and that life is impossible without them. But there are germs and germs. Those that cause boils are not the same as those that cause typhoid fever. They cannot live and grow in perfect health. Germs are everywhere, but healthy bodies may be free from them. Scott's Emulsion may be said to be germ proof, because it is such a perfect food that it creates healthy tissue, which is so healthy a condition that it is well nigh germ proof.
