THE RAILWAY FIGHT.

Whatever may be the outcome of the present hearing in the matter of the receivership for the Utah branch lines of the Union Pacific, there is no disputing that the array of legal talent on both sides and the skill and vigor of the opposing arguments have been of a character quite unique in the annals of local litigation. We believe it has never before have interests so extensive and representative as were at stake, or money commanded the attention of a Utah court, and we doubt, if ever, has there been a case in which so numerous a concituency were directly affected. It has been a treat of itself, apart from the underlying importance that it possesses.

The NEWS some days since declared that the impending change meant a battle royal among conflicting railway interests. The legal contest now approaching its end is but the beginning of the more stubborn and portentous conflict that is to come in the field of actual commerce. We do not pretend to enjoy the confidence of the magnates on either side of the controversy, but we are nevertheless in a position to know that in a few weeks will be witnessed one of the liveliest scrimmages this section of country has ever beheld, and can promise that the result of that scrimmage, to say nothing of its immediate aftermath, will be almost inestimably beneficial to the business of this city and hence of the Territory. Salt Lake City has, Cinderella-like, been forced to sit awhile among the ashes; if signs and promises mean anything, she is about to don the loveliest robes of prosperity and to dance in crystal slippers.

SPIRITUOUS GIFTS.

A London correspondent writes that good Queen Victoria has sent to her grandson (by marriage), the czar of Russia, a cask of her own particular Scotch whiskey for a birthday present. It is further learned that this whiskey is something very special indeed, and brewed for her majesty's own particular drinking; furthermore, not more than sufficient is distilled for her own use and for the presents that she likes to make to different members of her family. The czar is understood to suffer from occasional attacks of rheumatism, a complaint to which the queen herself is subjected, and it is presumed that her sympathy for the young emperor, as well as profound confidence in the efficacy of her favorite remedy, prompt the gift referred to.

It will be remembered that some years ago Andrew Carnegie sent to President Harrison a keg of the best Scotch product—an incident with which the newspaper paragraphers had a good deal of sport at the time, and which excited the ire of the temperance people. Still more recently, the vast quantities of wine, beer and "schnapps" sent to Bismarck on his birthday received extensive mention and advertisement. The present of a cask at once to a South African chief by the commander of the civilized host who came to dispossess or conquer him, is a matter of current knowledge, while nearly everybody, of the trade persuasion at least, is familiar with the horrors of the rancorous controversy between the respective governors of North and South Carolina.

All of which suggests that tippling seems to be deemed correct enough for royalty and rank, despite of acknowledged deadly injury to humanity in general; and that a fair field for the operation of temperance principles is at present occupied by unrepentant heresies and idols of form.

WOMEN FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

The talk in France of drafting young women for military service, as well as the men, indicates the tendency of things. The suggestion was recently from one in the Chamber of Deputies by one who is said to be a champion of equal rights for both sexes.

The proposed plan is that all individuals be registered at the local recruiting office, on the forms, and then draw lots. Those that each year draw the military numbers shall be carefully examined as to their physical capacity, and if found all that is desired, be given a course of instructing courting, then to serve either in the hospitals or in military post offices and telegraph stations.

The advocates of the new measure point out the great advantage of it to the army, inasmuch as it would make available for active military service a great number of men now employed in the work proposed to be given to the women. On the other hand, it has met with strong opposition all through France, because it proposes to draft into service not only the daughters and sisters of the common people, but every young woman, including society belles, heiresses and descendants of aristocratic families. Scientists, also, have come to the rescue, pointing out the probability that the adoption of the measure would prevent many young women from entering into a state of matrimony and thus have a tendency to decrease the number of births throughout the country, an eventuality to be guarded against in a state where, in the above of the people, the birthrate has been sinking for a number of years. For these reasons it is not probable that the measure will gain ascendency among the people, but the discussion is sufficiently characteristic of the present age to be of interest, and as the chief objection raised against it in France is partly valid in a country where depopulation is not feared—in Germany for instance—it is not impossible that before long somewhat less may be accorded to the fair sex, with the possibility of the creation of regiments of Amazons in the next century.

THE OLD WAY BEST.

The experience which Michigan has had under the abrogation of capital punishment is rather more effective as an argument than all the sentimentality with which advocates of the plan go about seeking to win other commonwealths to their side. It has had a practical trial for nearly a generation in the peninsula state, and during that time a great many interesting statistics have been accumulating. An examination of those for the decade 1880-1890 is fruitful in comparisons, the most telling of which is that in those ten years murders increased more rapidly in that commonwealth than in any other state in the Union. Since 1885 the figures show that there have been 404 murders in Michigan, while in the neighboring province of Canada, which has a population three times as large, there were but 223 during the same period. And so if the comparison were not of itself sufficiently startling, it is further evident that the effect of the prohibition of the death penalty has been not only to encourage crime, but to discourage prosecution, for out of 193 murders committed in 1892, thirty-nine of the perpetrators were never brought to trial, and only 3 per cent of those tried received life sentences.

It cannot excite much wonder that with such experiences before them, other states are slow to depart from the stern old code which declared that "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." There is a strong and growing sentiment in Michigan itself that the state has had enough of its experiment.

THE SMALLEST ON EARTH.

The smallest republic in the world is supposed to be the Republic of Tavolara, on an island of that name, a few miles from Sardinia. Its population is given as fifty-five. In 1836 the island was accorded independence and was governed for forty-seven years by a king, before this monarch died he expressed a wish that his faithful subjects would govern themselves, and for four years after the demise of the sensible ruler, they got along without any ruler at all. Nine years ago, however, it was found desirable to adopt a form of government, and after several mass meetings in which the women took a prominent part, a constitution was adopted and a republic proclaimed. The financial affairs of the Lilliputian commonwealth are in a good condition, because the president, who is elected for six years, and his cabinet as well as other public officials, serve without salary. The sum of the privilege of being governed in this lackadaisical manner is a maximum.

DEATH IN WEARING APPAREL.

"Diseases in cloth" is perhaps the latest word of warning from scientific men in a race already trembling at the revelations made of tiny but deadly enemies surrounding it on all sides. The alarming report now published that a Munich physician, who has made a series of careful investigations of bits of cotton and woolen goods, has found that on an average goods of the latter material contained 700 microbes to an inch and an eighth, while cotton holds an average of 175. The researches were made on the cut ends coverings that had been worn for some time. A glove was best examined, and although it had never been worn, being new, it was found to be inhabited by thirty-three little animals to the square inch. Prof. Bernheimer, Further experiments proved conclusively, it is asserted, the moisture exist to a greater or less extent in all wearing apparel.

It is not contended that all animal germs are deadly because they are so most infinitely small. On the contrary, some are believed to be perfectly harmless; but the fact that they multiply, live and multiply in clothes indicates that the more dangerous germs do the same. It has, for instance, been demonstrated that typhoid bacilli can live in clothing under ordinary circumstances for a period of twenty-five days, a fact which would go far to account for the so-called mysterious spread of the disease.

It is well to be warned of the presence of the possibilities of danger, but it is also well to remember that nature usually supplies the best preventatives as well as remedies against all physical ills. If people would live temperately in every habit, complying with natural laws, the violation of which always is followed by a penalty of some sort or another, they would preserve in their system the vigor and strength needed to the successful resistance of any deadly microbe. Medical science has rendered invaluable services lately in tracing to their sources many dire cases; it will complete its work some time by pointing out how to prevent or to be rendered innocuous to the agents responsible for the premature loss of life. Then it will be found to be the eloquent exponent of the Word of Wisdom.

The final figures as to the respective strength of the silver men and the anti-silver men in the next Congress is given in a late issue of the New York World. The views of 154 members are published, of which number 55 are unqualifedly for free silver coinage, 11 favor bimetalism with qualification, and 17 are for the gold standard. As a majority of the answers come from the southern states, this, of course, does not fairly represent the relative strength of the silver party in Congress.

Instead of admitting that the insurrection in Cuba is at an end, the dispatches of yesterday varied the monotony by reporting that General Campos had cabled to Spain for six more battalions of infantry. The various correspondents seem there appear to take turns in furnishing news to the outside world.

Several of the recent state legislatures have devoted attention to the matter of the proper pronunciation and the correction of spelling of the names of their counties, creeks, canyons, and so on. How would it do for the next Utah assembly to tackle Tooele?

The people who have arranged for excursions these days are properly anxious to know whether the man who is paid to observe the weather is attending to his job or is just allowing the weather to run itself.

It is not true that one of the prominent aspirants for political honors is trying to capture the workingman's vote by toiling in disguise in the sewer trenches. But that's about the only trick he has not yet resorted to.

It doesn't operate against Major McKinley in the least to be told that McClellan was the only Mr. ever nominated to the Presidency—and he didn't get elected. McClellan didn't come from Ohio.
