ABOUT MINING CAMPS.

Notes by a Correspondent of the Return From a Tour.

Taking a circuitous route and passing many mining camps south of the old road, the first camp we reached was West Tintic. Here we found many good mines and prospects that will pay when transportation by railroad is obtained. The next place visited was an old camp named "Iron." In years past this camp boasted of a smelter which turned out many thousands of tons of ore, but owing to the nature of the ores, and the parties not knowing how to handle them, the smelter proved a failure. However, the gold and silver are there, and in the near future some one possessing scientific knowledge and money may step in and conquer. There are now but few men working. The cry is, "Give us a railroad within fifty of a hundred miles, and we will give you the ores, and wealth."

Sunset district is comparatively new, and we did not stop long enough to see much of it; hence we cannot do it justice. From Sunset to Oneida is one hundred miles' drive, most of the way without water, and all without grass. A spray with a sack and butcherknife could not get grass enough in a day's gleaning to feed a calf. Oneida once reached, all is forgotten about "hard times." Good-bye, Hampton & Co., who always make you welcome and happy by taking care of man and beast. Their mine is simply indescribable. It has to be seen to be believed. At first sight it is like a real dream. After shaking myself so as to find out that it was real, and that I was awake, I took a second look, and there counted two large pipes leading down the hill from a reservoir, a two hundred and twenty-five feet fall, twenty-two inches in the main pipe to a six-inch nozzle. This nozzle was a patent one and could be handled by a child. These nozzles were turned against the gravel, and behold! one could see the gravel fly. Rocks weighing hundreds of pounds were hurled as boys would throw rocks. It seemed as though the flood had all centered in one place. The sight was awing. We returned to the house filled with wonder. Just think of this mighty work. Two ditches dug around the mountain—one from the east, the other from the east, all the way through bone rock; and in many places blasting had to be done. Hundreds and hundreds of feet of fluming had to be put where the rock was too hard to make headway in. Just stop and think of an aggregate of twenty-three miles of ditching. Look at the east, and you will marvel. One hundred and ninety-three thousand dollars. The mine is situated in a deep, narrow canyon. The rock, gravel and dirt are washed down the giddy, the gold is caught in the riffles, in the sluices and in the rocks.

After a day's washing the foreman is the only man allowed to look over the ground and pick up the gold nuggets. When cleaning up day comes the men go on the ground with pans, little picks and brooms, gather up every particle of bone rock and dust left by the water, and put them in the pan. These men are watched by the boss, who stands on a high place so that he can see them all. What they wash out and clean up none but themselves know. One thing is certain: there is none of the stock on the market. Long may they live to enjoy the fruits of their underglaze and labor.

The mountains are full of quartz claims—many of them patented and lying idle—some for the want of money, some for the want of means to put up machinery. Some persons are waiting for a boom so as to sell, others have moved far away, well knowing that the mine is patented, and give themselves no concern.

About two miles south of Oneida we found Bonn Gifford working a placer claim by the dry process. He mines the gravel that contains the gold, then puts it out to dry. After that it is shoveled into a separating machine. This machine is something like a windmill used to clean threshed wheat. The gold is caught in a long pan, full of riffles. It is making from ten to fifteen dollars to the man per day. To describe all the mines and camps would tire the reader.

The Deep Creek camps are in a prosperous condition. New finds are of frequent occurrence. Pleasant Valley has had a new discovery of silver and lead, the veins being twenty inches wide, with an average of twenty-nine ounces.

Spring Creek has had a new and grand find. One firm alone is now surveying thirteen for patents.

Gold Hill, in Clifton district, though a new camp, has added its new finds this summer and fall.

Westman, Martin & Dennis are surveying fourteen claims for patents, besides having sunk for water and obtained it, so as to build a mill this winter and next spring.

We hear of railroads and rumors of railroads; but as yet not a railroad is there. But it must and will come, and when it does we will all be happy. Then the cry will be, "Give us more cars."

H. J. FAUST.

DEEP CREEK, Nov. 25, 1891.

The wages of society make it practically impossible for a convict to reform, even if he would give his life to the act. When employment is given in penitentiary contracts, the cry is raised that work is taken from honest men and be showed on thieves and outlaws. After serving a term in prison, if a man tries to get employment from the cry is raised of "jail bird," and no respectable workingman will labor alongside of him. The men of the world which are honest living may be earned, now so hopelessly crowed against him as were certain guys in Bible history against the rich man in Hell. What is the poor man who wishes to reform to do under these circumstances?

ROYAL BURIAL IN INDIA.

SOLEMN FUNERAL OBSEQUIES OF A MOHAMMEDAN RAJAH.

Ceremonies Attending the Death of an Indian Chief—An Impostor Pretending to the Throne of a Rajah in Hindostan—An Event That Interests Crowds.

From an early home records of Malays, Arabs, Javanese and other Mohammedan races had gathered in the grounds of the house lately built for the dowager of the Singapore royal line at Rempang Gilam. Before it without the large gates of the house were filled with white turbaned Arabs and Malays naked to the waist, and accordingly to his last social station perhaps for the dead. Within the house could be heard the splashing of water, where the corpse was undergoing ceremonial purifications previous to burial. Outside stood the bier, an enormous structure some twenty feet by twelve, made of lashed rollers and roofed with yellow cloth, cut into a fantastic fringe at the edges.

Really it was a bier within a funeral carriage, for the center was strengthened to contain the coffin, a space being left all around for relatives of the deceased. Temple to chief and another golden the over the crowd. In one corner of the ground the coffin was having its finishing touches. This was a massive box of 2-inch thick planks, decorated at the corners and keyed across the top. It was in itself a great weight and took a score men to carry it. The tone of the crowd in the ground was quiet and subdued, but by no means sad or despondent.

Behind the coffin itself, for instance, was a group of relatives quietly taking a meal. Scarce of Malay hope were seated on chairs on the ground, and the men, some nearly dressed, some in the primitive sarong, chatted about their dead chief. A little distance from the men stood the graveyard of granite, also swathed in royal yellow and lashed to a stage for convenience of carriage.

THE COFFIN.

The coffin, clean wood though it was, was carried away and also washed, being then placed in the porch of the house and half filled with sharp white sand to await the body. A power of Malay policemen arrived to keep order and other police officials appeared. In front of the house a row of sixteen men holding eight white and eight yellow were formed, and from many windows peeped the women of the household. A pitch of cannon in the industrial of the steeper had been firing at frequent intervals, being loaded by a gigantic negro. Meanwhile the servants of the house remained nearly silent, interest being centered in a group of kampu priests and Kadhis, who were seated in front of a stream of striped cotton, behind which the body was being prepared for the grave.

It was considerably after 8 o'clock when a movement among those seated in the house indicated that the time had come when the body would be put in the coffin. Amid a considerable commotion and a perfect babel of excited cries, all that remained of Tengku Allum was carried down stairs, wrapped in yellow cloth and included in a red edged mat. There on the shoulders of six priests the coffin was reached and the body deposited in it. H. H., the Sultan of Johore, reverently kissing it when the wraps were removed. The bystanders seemed perfectly frantic to get a look at the corpse ere it was placed on its bed of sand in the coffin.

AT THE GRAVE.

Then, in response to cries, a deathlike silence ensued, and as items, in a clear, musical voice, chanted some verses in Arabic, the bystanders responding in a deep tonal murmur. Then the heavy lid was got on, and with difficulty (the sand making it exceedingly heavy) the coffin was put into the bier of branch. Round about it placed themselves young Malays with salvers, whence they threw among the crowd yellow rice, spices, money and sweets.

Food enough for a number of days boating camps or rajas, some with spices, many with incense. Next were about thirty women in two lines, each with an enormous yellow candle and a slip of yellow cloth tied round their necks. Then came the hearse, borne by a great number of men escorted by the unlucky and followed by the governors and the immense concourse of people.

The distance to the mosque, about 200 yards, was laid with yellow cloth. The grave was in a small structure adjoining the mosque and abutting on the road. On reaching there the coffin was lifted from the bier. This was apparently the signal for the destruction of the bier, for in ten seconds it was surrounded by an earthed crowd who scattered at any part of it to secure a relic of what they believed had been sanctified by contact with the remains of their chief. Not a chief of the glorious yellow cloth was left on it and even the wood of the structure was taken.

With much difficulty the coffin was then lowered into the grave and close upon dusk the ceremony which marked the close of the "reign" of another rajah was concluded.—Singapore Free Press.

A national bank failing with liabilities of $6,000,000 and "irregularities" dating back several years looks queer for somebody, bank inspectors or somebody else. "Irregularities" appears to be the fashionable word now for what used to be called by a much more expressive Saxon term. Gentlemen at present boarding in hotels belonging to the state national irregularities in various directions.

"Hunted journalists" are an institution also of the empire of Germany and the republic of Guatemala. Let us never forget in patriotic moments to glorify the fact that here is in one of our most precious and hitherto American privileges to abuse in the newspapers the president, government and all its officials to any extent, a privilege taken advantage of in full, yet the American republic lives and grows greater yearly.

"I find the type of American women very agreeable," says my Miss O'Bull to the country just as he sets out on his lecture tour. "I have brought my daughter over that she may obtain a certain amount of Americanism." Turn he winks one eye to himself and laughs in his French sleeve.

How a Poet Writes.

That delightful author, Mr. Edwin Arnold, told an interviewer that he had in golden weather less than 500 editorial pages, each averaging over half a column. That is nothing remarkable; for Edwin Arnold is many years old. There are scores of American editors who write 1,000 leaders a year. But English editors do not write as rapidly as Americans.

One thing connected with his work is remarkable, however, and that is the way in which Sir Edwin writes poetry. He poetry still in and and poetical long after Arnold, the editor, is forgotten, and the poetry comes to him unsought and of itself. He does not grub and cogitate over it with pen and brain for hours in collecting thought. Those exquisite verses which have given his fellow men so much pleasure first take his brain of themselves, extemporized, uncorrected, at all times and at any time. When they come he "puts them down in the length" wherever he happens to be, and later polishes them up at his leisure.

Sometimes they first to him in the midst of editorial writing, and he "puts them down as they will." If he is writing a long poem he sits down when comes to him each day and lets the muse sway. This is the ideal way to write poetry or anything else. It seems to be the method of that superlative quality we call genius.

"German Syrup"

Martinsville, N.J., Methodist Parsonage. "My acquaintance with your remedy, Boschee's German Syrup, was made about fourteen years ago, when I contracted a Cold which resulted in a Hoarseness and a Cough which disabled me from filling my pulpit for a number of Sabbaths. After trying a Physician, without obtaining relief—I cannot say now what remedy he prescribed—I saw the advertisement of your remedy and obtained a bottle. I received such quick and permanent help from it that whenever we have had Throat or Bronchial troubles once in our family, Boschee's German Syrup has been our favorite remedy and always with favorable results. I have never hesitated to report my experience of its use to others when I have found them troubled in like manner." REV. W. H. HAGGARTY, of the Newark, New Jersey, M.E. Conference, April 25, '90.
