LIGHT THE LAMPS.

The electric light contract is still incomplete, and its consideration has been postponed another week. Judging from the discussion in the City Council last evening, there should not be much time wasted in getting together on the points of difference. These are very small, viz: the time limitation in which to turn on additional lights; the forfeit of double the price of a lamp when there is failure to illuminate it; the measuring apparatus in the city and county building; and the keeping, by the company, of men to respond to fire alarms and cut wires when necessary. As to the first, it is to the interest of the company to start service as quickly as possible, and an effort to require an earlier date would be abortive—the company could name its own limit and that would be accepted, but it should not be too far off. The second proposition ought to be settled so the company will be liable for any neglect of duty in lamplighting, at least to the extent of an addition, above the price of the lighting, to pay the expense of putting out the negligence. The third point should be decided in a way to keep the measuring system as far away as possible from the city and county building; there are too many people doing business there to take the slightest unnecessary risk of the danger which the company's electrician claims would be imminent; some people may think the company wasting superfluous, but it is better to be over careful than otherwise. On the fourth item, it could be fixed so that regular company employes could be called in an emergency to handle wires where firemen could not do so without both danger to themselves and loss to the light company.

A little yielding on each side would fix the whole business in short order, and enable the company to ascertain definitely when it could furnish illumination. There is no good to be gained in keeping apart on minor important technicalities, thereby depriving the public of the street lights which are so desirable, and we believe both parties will see it that way. The principal point in this business is to get the lamps turned on as soon as possible, for the convenience of the public.

THE RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH.

In the guarantee of the right of free speech it is of course understood that the freedom relates to such speech as is not injurious to the well being of the state. In this Republic the people, individually and collectively, have the constitutional right to express their views in the form of approving, criticising, or denouncing, if they so choose, the actions of public officials, so long as that expression can lay a good claim to respectability of character and does not work unjustifiable injury to men or institutions.

In the case of the judiciary of this land, the right has been conferred to regulate expressions and actions so as to courts so that these will be given the respect which is due them in order to secure maintenance of good order and the supremacy of the law. If attorneys were allowed to be disrespectful to judges in court, or anybody could disregard the duly issued process of a judicial tribunal, it would bring into contempt that department of government which ought to be held in the highest regard. Hence courts are authorized to restrain contemptuous language and conduct. But sometimes courts have gone too far in this matter.

This latter may not be the case in the rule promulgated by the Utah Supreme court Monday, but it seems to some pretty near being so. The court formulated as rule No. 25 an order that "improper, insulting or contemptuous language or conduct of attorneys, or concerning each other in court, or in and concerning the court, or any member thereof, either in or out of court, will be considered and treated as a contempt of court." This, it will be noted, extends to the use of language outside of the court, and may be readily applied to any sentiment wherein the judge of a court may be disagreed with, even though he may have committed a judicial blunder of the most serious character, or may be criticised as a citizen and not as a judge. This seems to be stretching the contempt blanket a little more than the occasion requires, and while it may be in harmony with the letter of the statute, the spirit thereof hardly could be that an attorney must be so formally respectful in his conversational references to a judge outside of the court room as within it. In this connection we note the language of Chief Justice Zane in dissenting from the adoption of the rule. He says:

> I dissent from the order adopting rule No. 25. Attorneys using improper language in court should be amenable to court and dealt with for contempt; but the language discussed in J. Zane's opinion is very close to and includes, without, as it appears to me, any necessity for it, language about the court and its members which, during twenty years of active practice in the Utah courts, I have never heard, and which I do not think, during the same period, I would have ventured to use in the presence of the court, or to address to any member of the court, or to any other person concerning the action of the court.

If it is within the right of free speech to criticise the action of the court so widely, and it is within that right, to sometimes apply to a person who may be a judge language of a more emphatic character that would be fitting when addressed to that same person as a member of the court. There is a wide difference between one being an individual who may be a judge, and contempt for the judicial position or action of that individual. While everybody may have the highest respect for the present members of the Supreme court such as men and as judges, and may have any fears that they will apply the rule to its expressed extent, yet we cannot but feel that the chief justice has laid down the proposition which would be safer for the court in the respect for itself.

DISINTEGRATION "BEGINNINGS."

Those acquainted with the history of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, either as members of the Church or otherwise, must be amused, if their attention is directed at all, by the statements now made in certain quarters and given voice through a certain class of newspapers that the present condition of things here "is the beginning of the disintegration of the Church." Such "beginnings" have been heralded almost without number, now before and since the Latter-day Saints came to Utah, and all have ended where they began. The only thing of a setting character connected with them is the disappointment which attends those who hope for something tangible in the way of the proverbial weakening; for the Church doesn't disintegrate worth a cent; the reason thereof being well known to those who comprehend its genius, realize its purpose, and recognize the omnipotence of its Founder and Head.

"If the conditions were as some folks effect to believe, there might be some occasion for speculation as to the outcome; but they are not, for the alleged conditions are descriptions by persons who, from diverse motives, antagonize the Church, and these were never known to describe with accuracy its actions or objects. This class of persons are so excessively anxious for the "disintegration" spoken of that they seize upon every opportunity to misrepresent, even to their own minds, events which they hope may lead to their way of thinking, and do their utmost to give them force. But this overweening desire is soon manifest to that portion of the public who do their own thinking, and its doom is disappointment instead of strange recognition. This is the case in the present situation, and in the midst of these prognostications of dire disaster to the Church, cleat-headed and unprejudiced people note an effect of an entirely different character.

Men in a state of consciousness do not have their bodies racked with pain without having some knowledge of the fact. And if the Church were so greatly disturbed as some people seem to fancy, it would be likely to recognize that state of affairs in short order. The truth of the case is that there is no disturbance or uneasiness whatever, as to the Church's present or future condition, among those of the members who have been alive to an observance of their duties and obligations. These persons the even tenor of their way, and while they may manifest a curiosity upon and gossip to some extent over certain matters that may be brought forward from time to time, when it comes to action as Church members they are found at the post of duty on every occasion. This membership of which we speak is not restricted to any age or sex, but includes all, young as well as old; and spacious pleadings to "pray Utah" or any other division will not move them from the right. The "disturbed" element are operating on a somewhat different plane, and the harmony of such is seldom a suddenly acquired quality.

Instead of worrying over the prospect, the active, faithful membership of the Church sees in the near future, therefore, the brightest outlook ever extend for the advancement of truth in the religious world. The newspaper and pulpit pyrotechnics that have attended the recent announcements of "the beginning of the disintegration" do not alarm anybody who is aware of the facts. There has been too many of these "beginnings" for even non-members of the Church to take stock in them to extent; those who have looked on them might to have learned by experience that their support has been a broken reed, and should have become wary by this time. Whatever some people may think to the contrary, the outlook for the Church never was brighter and better than it is today, and it always was bright in the sure promise of success in the work of the Almighty.

BUTTER AND OLEOMARGARINE.

There is an agitation among grocers and dairymen in Pennsylvania to have the lawmakers of that state follow the example of the Utah legislature at the recent session, and enact a statute affecting the sale of oleomargarine as compared with butter. Under the old system, formerly in vogue here and yet prevailing in Pennsylvania, also could not be sold openly, but the most enterprising butter could be got on the market without difficulty. Under the condition the oleomargarine was placed their product in the field, and much of it was sold as cooking butter, and was bought for table use by those who were content with an article of medium quality. Then the state spent a great deal of money in prosecuting those who sold the oleo, till wholesale dealers in it practically abandoned the fad, and a much less traditional product, cooking butter and butter substitute, was brought into the place. The situation has brought about the demand for the change, and it is urged that prohibiting the sale of oleo is called fair to manufacturer and consumer, as it encourages the farmer to practice dairying and improve on the latter by permitting the sale of a product that ought not to be allowed to become food.

In Utah the effort at keeping out the oleo was as much of a failure as it is in Pennsylvania, and the lawmakers wisely decided to allow the sale of all such productions as were not injurious to health. At the same time each of these must be disposed of in its true character; people who want oleo or butter can get it under its proper name, and are sure to health than when they take rancid or adulterated butter, the sale of which is prohibited. Under our law, which does not make an occasion to resort to oleo in order to sell butter, the consumer can get either that or butter when he wants it, and is aware of what he is taking; when goods in stores, etc., have to be sold fraudulently as to whether the golden-colored article on the table is oleo or not butter. The working of this law cannot be worse than the old one and it gives good promise of being much better.

Prof. Newman, of Toronto, was at present "drawing a salary from the richest woman in the state of California, Mrs. Jane L. Stanford," according to a San Francisco exchange, as a professor in the Stanford university, made an address at the woman's congress in the great metropolis Saturday night, in which he opposed woman suffrage and made some very complimentary remarks about women. When he got through the Rev. Anna H. Shaw took up the gauntlet he had thrown down. There was no division of opinion as to where the victory belonged, even the anti-suffragists admitting that the little woman was vastly more than a match for the distinguished professor.

In the new play, "Lorette and Jeanne," written by Sarah Bernhardt, the plot is the story of two sisters, one married, the other, jealous of her sister's happiness, tries to steal her husband's love; and we are told that "Mme. Bernhardt has written the play so cunningly as she thinks will suit the American public!" The distinguished actress ought not to waste her talents in trying to suit that part of the American public that can find pleasure in such a play.

To the Editor:

Will you kindly answer the following question? When speaking or writing about the Presidency of the Church mean the First Presidency only, or does it include the Twelve or any other quorum? Yours truly, W. H.

The Presidency of the Church means the presiding quorum of the Church. If the First Presidency is meant, that is the body properly referred to as the Presidency of the Church, and the term when so used does not include other quorums.

Rain or Shine

Business goes on just the same in this great store—of course, the past week has been very bad for people to get about, but they come here just the same. There are no dull days here. We have goods for rainy days as well as for sunshiny days. We have a little talk for the men this week.

If it Rains Today

You will be sorry that you have not bought one of those fine Mackintoshes of ours. They are dressy and as soft as the finest Melton. They never get hard or stiff, and they are absolutely odorless. Whatever new worsted and tweed patterns as pretty as can be and nobby everything about these rain-proof garments is up to the minute styles and the prices are left right for your pocketbook.

If it Rains Today

You will need an Underfly; why not come and get one now, for if it didn't rain today it may tomorrow, and then you will need it just the same. We can suit you, we know. Can sell you one from 75c to $5.

If it Shines Today

You will be sorry that you have not bought your spring suit. We have a beautiful line to select from, the styles are the very latest and patterns are the newest. IF IT DON'T SHINE TODAY is may tomorrow, so you had better come in and have us fit you. We have suits from $10 up.

If it Shines Today

You won't want to wear that old hat. The hat has now is a hobby of ours. We make less on our hats than anything else we have in the house. We carry the celebrated Dunlap hat; everybody knows what that means. We are sole agents for the Imperial. We have them at all prices, and the styles the very latest in vogue, but should it rain may shine tomorrow, so this is the day to buy.
