HEED THE SAFETY VALVE!

During the past few weeks the papers of this city and vicinity have contained almost daily notices of the death of comparatively young and normally sound, healthy men. The number of such instances will be startling in the highest degree to those even who recall only the most prominent of them; and the reflecting mind cannot but cast about for an explanation of a mortality at once so unusual and so alarming.

The NEWS believes that overwork lies at the bottom of most of the ailments that result fatally in the class of cases spoken of. We are aware that almost any amount of physical labor can be performed without immediate or apparent injury to the average constitution; few men kill themselves with bodily work if their mental faculties are preserved in health, their food be sufficient and their rest regular. But anxiety, care, worry—these are killers of men which no physician can combat, which no lock or wall can keep out. And when to mental ills is added the ceaseless labor of the hands—when after days of severe toil there follow nights of uneasy tossing—when the tired body and all the faculties woo repose in vain—then worked-out nature must succumb, the sturdiest frame must break, the candle of life, which had been burning rapidly at both ends, must suddenly flicker out in death.

The trouble with men—and with active, sensitive men this trouble is aggravated when reverses environ them—is that they think themselves capable of harder and more varied and more prolonged exertion than mortality was ever designed for. They not only set out to run at high pressure all the time, but they screw down the safety valve so that no warning of over-exertion can be given or received. The human machine cannot stand any such treatment. It is built with the capacity to withstand a certain strain, and the ability to perform a certain amount of regular work. This it can sustain and perform for an indefinite time with perfect safety. For a sudden emergency this pressure and this work may be many times increased, and still the machine run safely and with seeming ease. But not for long. Forced draft, dampers down, utmost tension of every part long continued, most quickly tell. There comes a slight thumping of some bit of the machine—a warning to shut off steam and make needed repairs. If heeded at once, all may be well—the danger is seen and averted; if disregarded, the slight weakness develops instantly into a fatal defect, other wheels and levers tear loose, there is a wholesale crash, and the grand piece of mechanism lies prostrate, pointless and a wreck!

We reiterate that in times like these, when business cares oppress almost every one, a man's duty to himself, his loved ones and the community requires that the warning which nature invariably gives be noted and acted upon. To die is to make the situation much worse than to grapple calmly with it and live. But patience one with another, courage, wisdom in preserving the energies with which all are endowed—these are the attributes which the crisis calls for—the only ones which will enable any man to endure the strain.

SAVING THE "CONSTITUTION."

Referring to the recent death of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, his lifelong friend, admirer, disciple and in many senses his [illegible], contributes many sharp [illegible] reminiscences to The Independent (New York) for its issue of October 18. One of the most interesting of these relates to the saving of the old frigate Constitution after the order for her destruction had been given by the Washington authorities. As an incident of history and a matter concerning which the patriotic American youth of all ages deserve to be kept informed, Dr. Hale's contribution is invaluable. Certain that it will be read with much interest by American boys and girls here in the mountain tops, we quote it:

It was in 1830 as one of the first evidences of a new reign which came from the administration of General Jackson that the secretary of the navy of that time, John Branch, gave an order to the naval commissioners that they should break up the frigate "Constitution." [illegible]

"Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!"

And sent them to the Advertiser, and they were printed the next day. [illegible]

GOLD BY ACCIDENT.

Of the fabulously rich mining camp of Cripple Creek, Colorado, which is less than two years old, is reached only by stage routes, and has already had its full share of sensationalism and [illegible], there is the usual legend, and as is also usual in such cases, the story has some very pretty qualities. Cripple Creek's romance is as follows: A young druggist from Colorado Springs went prospecting back of Pike's Peak. One day at noon, tired out, he sat down on the top of Bull hill to eat his lunch. For dessert he had some nuts which he cracked with a stone lying at his feet. In this stone he saw tiny particles of gold. The result was a claim, and the great Pharmacist mine of today, which yields $20,000 worth of gold a month and is the hope of the gold-mining interest in America. Maybe this is all true, and maybe not. But it seems to strike the popular fancy and is being extensively quoted and commented upon.

POSSIBLE RESULT OF THE WAR.

The extraordinary session of the Japanese diet convened at Hiroshima is ended, after having passed with enthusiastic unanimity every measure proposed by the government as necessary for the continuation of the war with China. Before adjourning the members expressed a desire that the Chinese empire should be sufficiently humiliated to insure peace in Asia; and no foreign interference was desired, as it is firmly believed Japan alone is capable of carrying out the object she has in view.

It is evident, however, that as the helplessness of China becomes more apparent and everything indicates the rise in the extreme East of a great naval power, England views the situation with alarm and is anxious to interfere, to save the Flowery kingdom from destruction. The United States government declined, as will be remembered, to join a proposed European coalition for the purpose of restoring peace. Germany has shown no eagerness to interfere, and Russia can hardly be counted upon as a party to anything in which Great Britain is particularly interested. It therefore looks as if Japan would have plain sailing in her exploits for fame and glory and spoil, unless England at last practically single-handed should undertake to stop her progress.

In view of these facts there are many speculations regarding the possibilities of the outcome of the war. The fact is recalled as significant that some time ago a Russian officer in a company of foreigners in Pekin declared that he expected to become the governor of the province of Pechili, which lies upon a gulf in the Pacific that would be the very outlet needed for Asiatic Russia. Should it transpire that the adjoining portion of China were to be transformed into a Russian province, it is clear that other countries would insist on their share. France now practically holds Anam and Tonquin and has long desired the provinces of Quangsi, Kwangtung and Yunnan. England holds Hong Kong and would not give it up without compensation, so would probably claim control over the interior provinces of Burmah, following down the valley of the Yangtse Kiang to Shanghai. With Russia as master of Mongolia and Manchuria, France along the coast, and Great Britain in central China, and with Japan in possession of Corea and Formosa, Asia would be tolerably well sliced up between the great powers, somewhat after the manner of procedure on the African continent.

It is not probable that such a division will be the immediate result of the present war, but it may nevertheless ultimately follow. That civilization which owes its superiority to Christianity is steadily marching onward, and before its progress heathen institutions crumble and fall to pieces. It is no wonder that a nation with the peculiar characteristics of the Chinese should at last be broken up; it is more a matter to surprise that it should have been able to maintain its independence behind its wall of exclusiveness so long. The coming century will probably see a great change.

MISSION PRESIDENTS AND ADDRESSES.

The NEWS is frequently asked by letter for the names and addresses of the presidents of the Elders of the various foreign missions of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and inquiries of the character are almost daily received at the President's office in this city. To obviate the necessity of answering each individual letter of this kind, and in order to place conveniently before the Saints the names of those with whom they may communicate direct on all appropriate matters of business, the following list has been prepared, and will be published occasionally with such corrections as changes in the personnel or the location of the respective headquarters from time to time may render necessary. In the following list, the designation of the mission comes first, then the name of the present president, and then the street and post office address of the mission headquarters:

A BURGLAR who broke into a New York house the other night gathered up what silver-ware he wanted, then sat down in the library with a dull book in his hands, and fell asleep. The moral is that books of the right kind are at times better than a watch-dog, a policeman or a gun.

THEY CALL him now "that splendid fanatic, Dr. Parkhurst," who is cleaning both the inside and outside of the New York political platter. What a difference one small adjective makes in a phrase! Leave out the "splendid," and the above compliment would be a term of utter reproach!

WHAT one political party lacks in confidence in and understanding of its own principles, it makes up in sneers at and ridicule of the other. And yet men talk of "educational campaigns" and such-like rubbish!

WHERE one woman looks in a mirror to arrange her front hair, five men glance in to see if their neckties are in proper position. These are unexpected statistics, but they are true.

TWO WEEKS more of the turmoil, then the jubilation, or the despair. Politics is a hot old game, and half the time it is not worth the candle.

Look! Look!

Having purchased the balance of the large stock of the Burton-Gardner Company, we will give specially reduced prices for one week only, to save expenses in handling.

NEWS FROM THE NORTH.

Mr. E. O. Barbee, who has been in the north on a business trip for two months returned home Sunday morning. During his trip he visited all the important towns and mining camps in Southern Idaho, and that part of Montana about Helena, and reports everything in a much improved condition everywhere. All through the agricultural country along Snake river in Southeastern Idaho the land is being taken up and cultivated and towns growing rapidly, and thinks St. Anthony the best [illegible] of his travels and the Gold camps of Virginia City, Sheridan, [illegible] Silver City and [illegible] all in a booming condition, and Hailey is again coming on its old time form. Mr. Barbee is highly pleased with our new location, but not at all surprised at our large increase in trade, as it is no more than would naturally follow with the increase of stock and [illegible]. He thinks our new fall goods the most desirable selection and at the lowest prices he ever saw offered. His own sales were four times as much as on his last trip over the same territory last spring. This he thinks is partially due to the better financial feeling, but more largely due to the greater inducements we are offering this fall.

Call and look over our goods, see and handle them—compare the prices. Then, and then only will you appreciate our offerings.
