FIGHTING INDIANS.

PARTICULARS OF A REGULAR WARFARE WITH A BAND OF SAVAGES.

Making war on Indians is unlike any other war making in which civilized people engage. Fighting them, not fighting them, is the difficult problem to solve.

If the reader will consider that the theater of operations in an Indian campaign—whether in Wyoming, Dakota, the Indian Territory and Texas, or Arizona—is about as large as the New England States with New York added; that each of these possible theaters of war is an uninhabited wilderness; that they are without roads, and often impassable for hundreds of miles; because of and sometimes impassable mountain ranges; that while all parts of each Territory are to the Indian as familiar as the paths of the house orchard are to the farmer and his children, it is said of recently mined veins unknown and to the best informed white men; that in those tracks in which the Indian has no fixed habitation, the savage being discovered by informing the citizens of the land he takes is a matter of difficulty to have that where night finds him is his home, and that he carries his all, clothing and all, with him—it will be seen that political matters depending on them are considered, as you can be formed of how difficult it is to make successful war on the Indian.

In war the Indian, though personally civilized, resorts to the worst phase of savagery. Much has been written as to the false sentimentality which [illegible] the settlers for these marauders be lost appreciated when the character and mode of warfare of the mountain Indian are understood.

An old frontiersman remarked to a cavalry officer: "We have a horse of them that you feel for a shot. We never let them, but when as the trail are always before our sleepless in ambuscade. When they strike, all we see is the flash of the rifle resting with secure aim over a pile of stones," behind which, like a snake, the foe maneuvers near full length.

All the Apaches are fighters, mountain climbers. They will steal horses and use them, but when driven into the mountains the horse becomes a part of their fortunes. Graceful, well formed, with legs of steel wire, light and active as a cat, the Apache on the rocky hillside is unapproachable, and to fight him, with any chance of success, he has to be attacked with skill and great caution at any cost, as he is a foeman far up among the rocks.

Many a surprise has been defeated by night marches against natural fortresses, absolutely unassailable in the daytime by any number of men, and where, if the Indians had discovered the moving columns, even in the night, they could have repulsed them with great slaughter.

As a first step in the campaign, the commanding general directed that all warriors receiving rations should be counted every day at a place to be selected within five miles of the post.

In order that the officer detailed for this delicate and dangerous duty might be able to identify and keep a record of the young men, a metal tag stamped with a number was issued to each Indian of fighting age. Many of the Indians received the order with sullen disinclination, because, if carried out, it checkmated their roamings. Seated on their heels in increasing concentric circles in front of the General, the crouching multitude and the steady glare of their brilliant bead-like eyes made them resemble snakes coiled ready to strike, and it was plain that when opportunity offered they would resist by the most deadly means this effort to switch them.

The next day the cavalry officer detailed rode out four miles from the post, accompanied by one orderly, to meet the young savages and make his first count.

The officer selected was one who had seen considerable service and fighting, but he subsequently confessed that he would have been glad to exchange the duty assigned him for a detail to lead a forlorn hope over a breastwork.

However, he had been told by the General that it was inadvisable to send a force on the duty, as some of the warriors might become alarmed, and, in their ignorance, make trouble, and that the object was to give the Indians a fair chance. So, and he rode with his heart in his throat, feeling pretty confident that unless he had his head some young "cinch" would stab him in the back, and, thus distinguishing himself, take his departure for the warpath.

The place selected was at the foot of a hill on which was situated the largest Indian village of the reservation. Arriving at the point, the officer was met by the whole band coming down the hillside with yells and shouts, and as they approached nearer he had the horror of perceiving that they were nearly all drunk. They had been celebrating the disagreeable order of the day before by a "swain" spree.

The officer received the change by dismounting and standing, with a nonchalance which was far from natural, at the foot of a large cottonwood tree, the orderly, mounted, holding the horses a few yards in rear. It was soon apparent that several of the chiefs had received orders and were doing their [illegible]
