MODERNISM IN POETRY.
And the comfortable respiration of the muse has been disturbed by contemporary consciousness. In two respects: first by limiting her free heritage of the air. In our egotism, we would have all the subject-matter of poetry contemporary. Leave off singing of old wars and loves, retelling ancient myths. What's Hebe to us? "Lead, send a man like Robbie Burns to sing the song of steam!" And we would teach our poets that poetry is being lived all about us; that they should be the mouthpieces of their age; that no man can step off his own shadow; and that we cannot sing those old songs truly. Now it is true that our time contains as much poetry of life as any; but precisely because it is our own, this poetry of life is unsuited for translation into poetry of art. For poetry deals of necessity only with what is either old or ageless. You may poetize a locomotive, not because the thunderous fire-breathing steel monster is unbecomingly or unpoetic, but simply because it is too near. It is yet raw, surprising commonplace, but not connotative, unfringed of glamour. The mounted messenger it poeic substance; our mail system, like gunpowder and some other elder inventions, is just becoming so, wireless telegraphy is magical but impossible. When modern material of life shall have aged, then and not before will the song of steam be sung. All poets in all ages have felt this. Homer was no contemporary of Achilles; in his day the gods no longer mingled with men. And this truth is clinched by the failure in all times of even genius to poetize the physically contemporary. Milton's artillery is absurd; Tennyson's guns are poetic, his railroads ridiculous. Of course no poet can possibly help being the mouthpiece of his own age, not by choice of subject or imagery, but in treatment. We may tell of the beginning of worlds, yet we cannot see it but with timely tongues; and all attempt to imitate the manner of another age is as futile as to exploit the matter of our own. The things which are not seen are externally poetry. The temporary visible and the timbre of modernity must and should be left to adjust themselves.—Brian Hooker in the Forum.

IN THE WILD WEST.
A story is told of a woman whose husband had one day been away from home much longer than was usual. She waited patiently, however, when to her surprise and alarm, a band of ruffians rode up and dismounted a little distance from the hut, and approaching her, the leader of the party exclaimed apologetically: "We come to tell you, ma'am, that we've lynched your husband. We admit we've lynched the wrong man, so you've got the laugh on us there." Illustrated Bits.

Hot—Sure it's pretty hot yet and it will be better for the children starting to school if you feed them a little less meat and more
