TRIAL BY FIRE.

The major was one of the more well Low Englishmen who come to California with a younger son's portion and a small monthly allowance and hope to make a fortune in a year or a year and a half. The place always looks inviting to Englishmen, and the agent secures by virtue that the thousand pounds will buy a few acres plus plain house. Build a cottage bungalow and talk to visitors over gold ore which shall lose and bring him a harvest of good American gold.

The major was going the way of most of his friends. Year by year he grew poorer, and the monthly allowance of five pounds from home grew smaller and smaller. Injury always gave painfully small as it neared California and the other it was supposed to cure. The major's little mountain vineyard was now destroyed by phylloxera and he was trying to use his universal property in a number of good claims, called so carefully, "the only remaining." But the major was not sanguine. Year by year not filling the coffers of an earl he to remain, with no little wood pipe he knew his body and mother, the high parson, picturesque Napa valley for his

It may be that the major's failure to succeed in life was greatly due to the fault of his surroundings, but that he should improve his surroundings was the thing expected by his family. The major was a good fellow, and he was liked by everybody, and he was liked and loved would pass—in a very, very long time—a very good fellow. The major was a good fellow
