THE RIGHT COURSE.

"Yours always—Marion."

The photograph on which the words were written stood upon the mantelshelf of a luxurious room in Pimlico.

The young man who read the inscription aloud was the original in Debrett as the Anthony Elliot, first grandson of the late Sir Peter Elliot, and fifth in out of his name.

"Marion," was Lady Marion Allardyce, the daughter and sister of an earl, a society beauty, and one of the richest heiresses in England. They were to be married in the spring, and he was on the point of starting to order to join the party at his country home.

A servant tapped at the door and entered.

"If you please, Sir Anthony, a gentleman of the name of Cross wants to see you."

"Cross? I don't know the name. What is his business? Did he say?"

"He's come all the way from New Zealand on purpose to speak to you."

He was shown in.

"Sir Anthony Elliot, I presume?" he queried.

"Yes," said Tony. "Will you take a chair? I am rather pressed for time."

"The business will not take me long to explain," he said. "Dr Bart, is out to lay in wait for a gentleman. I see here in London you that you have no more right to the name you bear than I have. Your father was a carpenter, and he sold you to Sir Elliot for a £5 note."

There was a moment of silence. Tony's cigarette went out. He threw it into the grate.

"You make a very strange assertion," he said slowly. "Will you kindly explain yourself?"

"With pleasure," replied Cross. "Your reputed father died a year after he married, quarreled with his father and became a stony farmer in New Zealand. I was his best neighbor and knew all about him. Three weeks later he was the only child and he."

"Then Mrs. Elliot adopted a workhouse's baby and left the place. I didn't understand her motive at the time. I remembered her when I learned that the late Mrs. Elliot had hated her favorite nephew because he followed his father's wishes and married against her husband's wishes."

* * * * * * *

Cross handed him two papers. "You can have 100 more proofs, if you like to go out to Queensland," he added briefly.

"And your object in traveling three souls of miles on a matter which does not concern you? I presume you have a motive?"

"Certainly," said Cross calmly. "I want comfort and security for my old relative in $1,500 a year for life, and you can enjoy your fortune in peace and marry your fine lady. I'll hold my tongue."

"Two heads of good sense," said we. "Let's have a drink on it."

The carpenter's son pulled himself together, threw his head up and pomposity ordered Cross out of his house. But when he was alone he sat down and dropped tears from the bottom of his soul.

He wrote to Marion that important business would detain him for hours for a few days and called to a globe-trotting friend.

He answer to his messenger, he found, that afternoon, at dusk, the genteel hire in the great hall of the old country mansion.

"We shall have an hour or two alone. But how white you are, Tony!" she added quietly. "There is something wrong. What is it?"

"You shall know directly, Marion." He took her left hand in both his own and looked at the flashing lines of diamonds he had placed there. "I have something to tell you—something that will change the current of our lives. But before I tell you I should like to be with you just for half an hour, to enjoy, for one brief half hour more, the sight of your face, the sound of your voice. My sweetheart, I want to live for a little while before the darkness falls. May I?"

"I don't know what it all means, but of course I am ready to do whatever you wish, Tony." There was a pause presently, and she touched his sleeve.

"Tony, your luggage. Didn't you bring one?"

"No," he said slowly. "I am not going to stay. You will understand when the clock strikes."

"Will it never strike, Tony?" The clock answered the question for itself.

"Lady Marion Allardyce," he said "I give you back your freedom. Recently I learned that I have no right to the name I bear. Today the news was verified to me. It is sufficient for you to know that my father was a carpenter in a remote village, and that my name is not Sir Anthony Elliot at all, but just Anthony Brown."

"Is that all?" she cried. "Is that all? You frightened me to death. I could not imagine what terrible thing had happened."

"You don't seem to understand," he said. "I'm a pauper, a nobody, a—a—I'm Anthony Brown."

"Well, are you any the less a gentleman by birthright and education? Are you any the less the man I love—the man of all others whom I have chosen to love, honor and obey till I die? Would you refuse to marry me if my history were similar to yours? Of course you wouldn't, Tony," she added, breaking out into smiles. "You—you—idiot!"—London News.

Sidney Sisters.

While rumors that in the air as to the possible marrying of sisters, the Gallup sisters has come to by the side door with no one to announce it.

A few outer jackets were this thought out with the sleeve cut in this style, a few more weeks and then the velvet coated women had adopted it. Now the house bodices of heavy figured satin have the full bodicing sleeve to the wrist. There are few women who can not afford to wear a sleeve so made. The slender arm looks larger and the stout one is hidden. Very little stiffening is placed in them, and the slender ones must be quite long, with the sleeve dropping from it toward the elbow.

Do you know how the new sleeves of all patterns are put into the armholes? They have four or six rows of shirring to hold the fullness.

The plan is far more attractive than the plain, to which we clung so firmly not longer than a few months ago.

The New New Woman!

This may be the era of the new woman, devoted to intellect, philanthropy, politics and science, and ignoring all petty feminine foibles, but one would not suppose her vogue so entirely compulsory as to read all the literature of fashion that is being published, and not only published, but read with avidity. Perhaps the new woman herself has been unable to eliminate wholly from her complex and superior being the fleck, trivial records of fashion, gowns, bonnets and strategies and she may pass an intelligent note or two or two in the same. At any rate, there has been no time when women generally dressed more becomingly and well as at the present. One cannot now pick out the waiting or the lecturing or the professional woman by her neglected dress and disordered appearance.—Philadelphia Times.

Hair Such Repellers.

At Washington the attempt to cut down the wages of the women employed in repairing the mail sacks has aroused a storm of indignation. "These women have the most miserable lives, spectres and ill paid work that Uncle Sam has to dispense," says The Woman's Tribune. It is as much as a poor overworked female pulls and cuts do to get from one street to the back part of the post-office where these filthy mail sacks are in use. But women work over there at piece work, and the earn far from 10 to 40 cents a day. Yet when there is an attempt to reduce the price, women complaining are told by the authorities that "if they do not care to work at the price they need not, as there are plenty of others who will be glad to do it." Such a reply to women who are earning a mere pittance is a disgrace to our government. Senator Call has introduced a resolution to pay the women in daily wages.

No Longer Exclusive.

"Really," said Miss de Pauper, "it's very distressing to see how common things are getting."

"Yes," replied her mother, "furniture was a good deal cheaper back last year."

"It's positively shameful. Why, it's getting so that anybody can afford a thousand dollars' furniture."—Exchange.

A DYING SPARK.

Stop Right Now! Don't Light Another! You're Burning Your Brains.

Wrecks Along the Street-Side.

City Clerk Bilderer's Will Tell You, look at the dying spark in the cigar stump, or at the half burnt cigarette. "Throw it away! Throw it away! Don't let a single puff, not a single second, go by. Now, this is my last. I know that it is injuring my health and financially and my nervous system is ruined. I can't stand the pain and misery and I can't stand the loss of money. Why, I know how much I have spent for tobacco in my life. These good resolutions are generally made while the effect of the cigar or cigarette is still in the mouth, and the effort of intellect to the smoker and just as soon as the effects commence to pass away those good resolutions weaken, throughout subsequent efforts the mind is made to believe that the habit is a disease of the nervous system and that the education of the body, in order to be cured, requires a little tobacco. Would this be true, permanent relief may be secured by the use of tobacco? Certainly not. Tobacco and its manufactures are suffering from a disease of the nervous system, and mental supremacy aims to follow the use and continuance of tobacco. Does it suggest itself to you that the habit of tobacco is a disease? Tobacco is one of the things in life that is so peculiarly prepared to stimulate the effects of the nicotine in the system and to overcome the nerve crippling effects and restore the tobacco irritated nerves to a healthy and healthy condition? To this we say "Yes, there is the remedy." You will find it in No-To-Bac. This is easily and well, we all naturally are for quick relief. If No-To-Bac fails to cure, The Sterling Remedy Company, of New York, Montreal and Chicago have an honest faith in their remedy, that they positively guarantee to refund the money and the cures being issued and signed by some of the most reputable business men in the land. Write to Sterling Remedy Co. and we are glad to tell you in every way in our up to date pamphlet.

The cure of No-To-Bac while the pack for years has created a surprise generally, almost entirely discussed upon its merits and the recommendations of the users without fuss or publicity. No great claim is made for it, it is further in question to go into, and Sterling Remedy Co. without finding it on sale, get the genuine, has nothing but words of praise to give it.
