HIEROGLYPHICS IN ARIZONA

Interesting Traces of the Civilization of Prehistoric Races.

Well-Defined and Constantly Recurring Symbols That Indicate a Written Language—Pictures Waiting Used by a Later Race.

Arizona is a field for the enthusiastic ogist to work in which has been examined but little, writes a Tombstone correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. On every side there are a great number of mounds and ruins of large buildings, many of which never seen to extend, and which have never had a shovelful of earth turned over in them. The hardy prospector, as he climbs the steep rocks bounding the canyons, in his search for gold or silver ledges, sees, far up the sides of inaccessible cliffs, the openings to what are built the ancient cliff dwellers' houses, and which have never been examined by white men. No one can tell what discoveries might be made could access be had to them.

Hieroglyphics scratched upon rocks or other lasting substances have been used by nearly all ancient races to perpetuate the history of certain events among them. Egypt is full of the tombs of the ancient people who lived in Arizona. The remarkable picture rocks and boulders, with strange symbols upon them, left by the prehistoric races of Arizona, have been the cause of much discussion among those who have seen them as to who these ancient hieroglyphic makers were. Three theories may be divined into three different sides, which, it is thought, were made by three different races. The first, of very ancient date, left records on rocks, in some instances of symbols only, and in other instances of pictures and symbols combined. The later race, which came after the first race had vanished, made only crude representations of animals, birds or reptiles, not using symbols or combinations of lines.

The age of the most ancient pictographs and hieroglyphics can only be conjectured, but all agree on their antiquity, that they are very much old, and the difference between the ancient and the later race leads the observer to believe that the older hieroglyphics were made by a people far superior to those who came after them, and who left no record in symbols, as we have said, with the hieroglyphic or crude representations of animals and reptiles.

In many instances it is quite evident that the same rock or cliff has been used by the two different races to put their markings upon, the later or inferior race often making their pictographs over or across the hieroglyphic writings of the first race. Of the superiority of the first people who left their writings on the rocks or boulders found in the ancient mounds, ruins and graves there can be no doubt, for their writings show order and a well defined design in symbols which were evidently intended to convey their history to others, and it is quite probable that those who made the great mesitas, houses and canals were the authors of these writings. It may be truthfully asserted that the cliff dwellers of the rock houses in the deep recesses of the mountains were of the same race as the mound builders of the valleys, for exactly the same class of hieroglyphics found on boulders from the ancient ruins of the valleys are found on the rocks near the houses of the cliff dwellers.

If this superior race was so distinctive from all other ancient races of Arizona in their work—being so far advanced as to solve what would be called, even at the present day, difficult engineering problems, in the great canals many miles in length, the remains of which can be seen at the present time, and to bring them to such perfection for irrigation purposes; to build such great houses and to live in cities—may it not have been, as many who have studied the subject have contended, that the superior race were white people instead of a copper-colored race, as has generally been supposed?

The hieroglyphics of the more ancient race are often found on shelvard rocks on the slopes of the mountains leading to from the valleys, generally protected from the elements by overhanging cliffs, the dry climate has kept the writings from wearing away, and being in most instances picked into rocks which have a hard, glistening surface, but not a lighter color underneath, the contrast is very noticeable, and when in prominent places these hieroglyphics can be seen several hundred feet away.

As no metal tools have ever been found in the ancient houses or cliff dwellings, the hieroglyphics were probably picked into the rock with a sharp-pointed stone much harder than the rock upon which the work was done. It is a singular fact that, although iron, copper, gold and silver abound in the mountains throughout Arizona, no tools, ornaments or other articles of antique origin have been found in the mesas or ruins. Yet human ingenuity of another origin have been found which enabled the people who built the houses and canals to make use of the rocks for reducing ores, and to and attempt which can be found great quantities of an unknown kind of ore.

In many instances the hieroglyphic boulders have been found in great heaps of several hundred in number, as if many different persons had contributed a piece of their writings to the collection. These stones boulders have been found buried in the ground with the inscribing the stones in human beings, and could the writings on the boulders be interpreted we would undoubtedly learn of the virtues of the people who deceased, just as we do of a person who died in the present day when we read the epitaph on a headstone of the one who is buried beneath it.

In opening some of the mounds in the Gila valley Rhin they are found of the ruins built of great stone buildings, are on high ridges overlooking the valley, and which in many instances have remained where our fathers. In one instance there was found the impression of a body's head and hands, many, presumably, as it could be crawling over the lonely hill and passing. In another instance the mounds were made of a stone wall covered with hieroglyphics and in the drawings, which were thought to represent Indian musical instruments.

To a certain extent some of the pictured rocks built by the similar race tell us of part of the early life of this ancient people, for in a number of instances the pictures picked into the rocks, although rudely formed, are self-explanatory, and the ancient artist tells plainly by his work what he meant. On the edge of a little valley in the Superstition Mountains there was found a great rock on which had been scribed many small animals, apparently representing sheep, and at one side was the figure of a man, as if watching them. It may be the ancient herder himself, sitting in the shadow of the great rock and his sheep grazing in the valley below, had passed away the time in making the rock pictures. The hardy wind always still being to the mountains of Arizona may be the remnants of great bands formerly concentrated by this people.

The remains of the prehistoric mining operations are the strongest in the cave in Sonora, Mexico, and which set all the scientific men of the world talking and thinking, give proof of a greater age than many of the evidences, bones or relics of some of these ancient mound and canal builders.

The natural illustrating the great antiquity of prehistoric man in Arizona is the following: In digging a well on the desert south of Phoenix, at the depth of 175 feet from the surface, a stone mortar, such as the ancients used, was taken standing upright, and in it was a stone pestle, showing the mortar had been carried down by any underground current of water, and that it had not been disturbed from the position in which the ancient owner had set it with the pestle in it. There is only one way to account for the position of this mortar and pestle. They had originally been left on what at that time was the surface of the ground, and the slow wash from the mountains had gradually filling with loose gravel, and the surface for miles on every side to the depth of 175 feet.

The question is often asked: Will this hieroglyphic writing ever be deciphered? As we have asserted, the authors of the most ancient hieroglyphic writings of marriage were to have had well defined forms of marriage which were in common use for the purpose of writing. Is it not most reasonable to suppose that a race of people so far advanced in other ways would have perfected a method of transmitting by marks of some kind their records to those who might come after them? Again there is much system is seen in the use of symbols it may be presumed that the same mark, whatever used to be employed in a certain way, and with a fixed meaning, also at all times.

Having once a settled system of marks there must be a key to the hieroglyphic writings. The writings are quite likely the key for interpreting these hieroglyphic writings will come time be found on one of the pictures, or perhaps, hieroglyphics for the high mountains of it the one of the mounds not yet examined. On the other hand, there can be no key to the inferior race of pictographs made by the people who came after the mound, canal and city builders and disappeared, for the strange marked figures or hieroglyphics scribed on the rocks by the later people, if they have any meaning, it may, varying with each individual maker.

Who were these people who formed a great nation in the mesas and in the remote ages? Were they the ancient Phoenicians, who were not only a maritime but a commercial nation, and who, in their well-manned ships, might have found their way to the eastern coast of America ages ago, and then then journeyed westward? Or were they some of the followers of Cortez or Zenon who had wandered north and founded a colony of the Aztec? Whatever these people were and whatever way they came from, the evidences of the great work they left behind them gave simple proof that they were superior and different from other race around them, and these particular people may have been the bearded white men whom the Indians had traditions of when Cortez landed in Mexico. Hot cage, dated the Gila and Salt River valleys in 1775.

Yale's Hair Tonic

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: It affords me great pleasure to call the attention of the public to the Excelsior Hair Tonic, which is the first and only remedy known to chemistry which positively will cause gray hair back to its original color without dye. It has gone on record that Mme. M. Yale—wonderful woman chemist—has made this most valuable of all chemical discoveries. Mme. Yale personally indorses its action and gives the public her solemn guarantee that it has been tested in every conceivable way, and has proved itself to be the only Hair Specific. It never HAS FAILED immediately and creates a luxurious growth. Contains no injurious ingredient. Physicians and chemists invited to analyze it. It is not sticky or greasy, on the contrary it makes the hair soft, pliable, fluffy, and keeps it in curl. For gentlemen and ladies with hair a little gray, checked gray, entirely gray, and were BALD HEADED, it is specially recommended.

All druggists sell it. Price, $1.
