A NEW HOPE.

I ascribed at the "Silver Dollar"
I ordered at Dinn. The Cigar
That fell about my every hour
Cast shadow everywhere.

My little daughter listened,
And, smiling, made reply,
"I thought that shadows never fell
Unless the sun were high!"

THE LAST RACE.

One evening in spring some officers were assembled round the mess room fire in the cavalry barracks in Dublin. It had been a quiet night, but all the company had left with the exception of one gentleman, whose blank rent and general beating proclaimed him not as not belonging to "the service."

He was standing at a table with a small notebook in his hand, in which he quickly entered some bets he had made on the gaming-room which were to come off next day.

As he did so he called out to an officer who stood near the fire: "St. George, won't you risk a pony on the hurdle race tomorrow?"

"No," replied the officer addressed; "I never bet on my own horse; I only run him to give the regiment an interest in the race." So saying, Mr. St. George walked out of the mess-room, followed by a glance by no means amiable from the civilian.

The latter was a gentleman of good family and fortune in Galway, who was known as the boldest rider and best judge of horseflesh in that sporting country, both of which qualifications caused him to be regarded with immense respect by his young military friends, who listened greedily to the words of wisdom, on stable matters, which fell from his lips.

Not that the squire, as he was called, cared at all to keep his superior knowledge to himself. He was always good natured in giving his opinion when asked to do so, and consequently was very popular with all the young officers, with the exception of St. George.

That gentleman had a decided antipathy to the "honey squire," to whom he was a contrast in every way. Kerwan was dark and middle sized, with lank, off hand manners; St. George was tall, fair, and had a quiet, unapproachable manner, which always caused the veteran to feel at a disadvantage. But another reason contributed to the squire's feeling of irritation. A certain young lady, a Miss Fraser, whom he intensely admired, showed a decided preference for St. George's society, and avoided his attentions, although he was very rich and the soldier was poor. Mrs. Fraser and her two daughters lived in a handsome house of their own, but they had but a small income, and Kerwan, had flattered himself that either of the young ladies would gladly accept him. He had at first paid considerable attention to the elder girl, but latterly transferred his hairbrains to her pretty young sister, much to the annoyance of both girls, the elder of whom looked on him as an oldish lover, while her sister thought him an intolerable bore.

The day of the races was bright and pleasant, an immense crowd assembled on the course. The good folk of Dublin are keen lovers of sport, and turned out to a man, their female belongings being glad to have a day's outing, military bands and handsome coats being highly attractive in their eyes.

Mrs. Fraser and her daughters also betook themselves to the race, the elders girl fully intending to win back her quondam admirer, her sister being quite as determined to get rid of him.

The squire soon arrived. He was splendidly mounted and in high spirits, having just learned that the hussars were ordered on service.

He hoped that St. George would love and ride away to "orthodox military fashion," or—oh happy chance—he might be shot! He knew that the gallant hussar had the reputation of being a lady killer of the first order, and he fondly hoped he was only assuming himself—but to hated him all the same.

It must be acknowledged that there were good grounds for the accusation hitherto. As to St. George's flirting propensities, the handsome soldier would ask a fair one to waltz as if the happiness of his life depended on that particular dance, and when the regiment got the "route" and brought their flirtations to a sudden close, he would say "adieu" with the air of a martyr going to the stake, a demeanor which intensely delighted his brother officers, who thought his conquests a feather in the regimental cap.

As the squire now saw him ride past, in full swing costume, looking every inch the perfection of a gentleman rider, and marked the bright smiles with which Maria Fraser greeted him, he felt furious.

Seeing again to his horse he cleared a high fence near to such splendid style as to elicit the admiration of the bystanders. "Well done, squire, it's yourself can do it!" shouted one; "Galway for ever!" roared another, and amid a chorus of compliments from his admirers the squire galloped off.

But just then the races were rushing up, and he only reached the winning post in time to see St. George make a good finish and win the race.

That evening the squire returned to his hotel in a detestable humor, and, instead of the jovial laugh that usually announced his arrival, he maintained a gloomy silence. Indeed, he was sacrificed the society his servant, who knew by his really moat resign his office if that unlucky fellow did not use more polite language.

But Mr. Kerwan, however angry he might be, was not a man to easily discouraged. He believed very much in the power of perseverance, and next morning he called at Mrs. Fraser's house to offer her a box at the opera, and he was tolerably sure she would invite him to escort them there.

The page who opened the door said the ladies were out, but on being presented with a half crown remembered they would soon return, and asked him to walk up to the drawing room. The polite youth, having blown him up stairs, stole out to spend the money, and Kerwan remained quietly waiting until the young ladies or their mamma returned.

The folding doors of the room were closed, and he soon heard the street door bang and rush up stairs into the next room. They were speaking of a dance at which they had gone the previous evening, and at which St. George had not put in an appearance.

The squire was quite close to the door, and did not lose one word of their conversation.

He heard Miss Fraser say, "Really, Maria, you should try not to look so weather-glassy—people will remark it, and, besides, I am certain Mr. St. George didn't intended going to the dance. Something has prevented his being so."

"If he wished to go he would have been there," replied your Maria. "I fear he does not really care for us, and he is quite amusing himself. Unless he comes this evening I shall be sure of it. I told him we would be at home, so we shall see."

Kerwan had heard enough, and determined to leave the house quietly, so that the girls might not suspect he had overheard their conversation. Pitying the poor fellow who was on the table, he slide down into the hall and in another moment was in the street, without having been seen by any of the family.

How he wished that something might occur to keep St. George away that evening! Maria might then perhaps favorably contrast his devotion with the soldier's indifference. He knew that St. George had been unexpectedly persuaded going to the dance by being obliged to take another officer's duty, and there was a chance of his coming to do so again this day. So he resolved to go to the barracks and find out some pretext of a visit to Mr. Orville, who had asked him to inquire about a hunter he was anxious to purchase.

Just at this moment a drag drove up with that young warrior on the box, who hailed the squire and drew up with a crash. They were going to hear a celebrated chant at St. Patrick's church. Would he come? He at once joined the party, among whom was St. George.

After the service, as they were looking at the curious old building, the senior inquired if they would like to see the crypt. On their assenting, he let a lamp and they descended into the vaults.

Young Neville seemed delayed he had had enough of it, and ran up the steps, followed by all his companions except St. George, who was looking at an inscription at the far end of the crypt.

As Kerwan turned and looked back at the solitary figure of the hussar, the diabolical idea occurred to him to keep his dangerous rival out of the way for that evening.

In an instant he pushed the heavy door of the vault, which shut with a loud bang, leaving the poor young officer in semi-darkness and a prisoner.

The rest of the party went gaily back to their quarters without having observed the absence of their friend.

Half frightened and half exultant at what he had done, Kerwan returned to his hotel, and lost no time in presenting himself at Mrs. Fraser's tea table, where he was cordially welcomed by that lady and her eldest daughter, but scarcely noticed by Maria.

That young lady employed herself by standing on the balcony, watching the hall door and listening to every footstep in the entry.

As the squire stealthily observed her actions and preoccupied air, he thought with grim satisfaction that she would look on St. George none the house that evening, at all events.

Thinking it was now time to release his prisoner, Kerwan quietly bowed for leaving an entry, and bade the latter good night. As he left the house he looked up at the drawing room windows, the lamps shone out brightly, and he could hear Maria still singing, but Maria was leaning motionless over the balcony and gazing sorrowfully down into the street.

Kerwan turned angrily away, and hailing a cab drove to the senior's house, which was close to the church. He insisted on the old man to open the door of the vault under the pretext of having lost a pocketbook, which he thought he must have dropped in the crypt, and which he wished to search for immediately. He knocked long and loudly at the door, but no one answered, he could not make himself heard by any one in the street. At last an old man who passed by told him the sexton was not at home, but would return at eleven o'clock, so he had only gone to a friend. As it was now nearly daylight Kerwan determined to walk up and down and await his return. At last he appeared, and both men went at once to the church.

On the door of the vault being opened Kerwan expected to see the hussar rush out, but there was neither voice nor sound in the crypt. All was silent as the dead that had lain there for centuries.

A dreadful fear crept over Kerwan as a shout of horror from the sexton drew him quickly into the vault.

There lay the unfortunate young officer, stone dead! The poisonous air of the vault and terror of his situation had killed him!

Years after in a Spanish monastery was a monk who had brought much wealth to the community, and whose self inflicted penitence was so severe, that the brothers suspected his mind was borrowed by remorse, and they judged rightly.

* * * * * * *

Some few days after Maria Fraser had had seen the ill fated hussar Mr. Neville brought her a letter found in the dock of his late brother officer. It was directed to her and asked her to be his wife.

She never married, and could not forget St. George, who was her first love and her last.—London Society.

It Takes Two to Make a Bargain.

A gentleman residing on the West Side tells a good story on his wife, which is worth repeating.

She had advertised for a girl for general housework, and early the next morning a well dressed, neat looking white girl called and applied for the place.

"Are you a good cook?" inquired the lady of the house.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Are you a good ironer? My husband is very particular about his collars and cuffs."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Do you like children?"

"Well—yes, ma'am; but I have never been a child's nurse."

Several other questions were asked and answered satisfactorily, and the lady, finding the girl's references good, was just congratulating herself upon her good luck when the girl commenced to ask questions.

"Will I have to take care of the children?" she inquired.

"Only when we go out for an evening," replied the lady.

"What time do you have your meals?"

"We generally breakfast at 8, have lunch at 12 m., and dinner when my husband gets home from the office, sometimes as half past 6 and sometimes at 7."

"Can I have every other evening out and every Sunday afternoon and evening after dinner?"

The lady turned pale, but replied promptly, "That is more than I have ever allowed my girls, but I guess we can manage that all right."

"What wages do you pay?" asked the girl.

"Two seventy five," replied the lady.

"Do you have a washwoman?"

"No; my girl must do the washing."

"Well," after a short pause, "I guess you won't suit me." And before the astonished lady could recover from the shock the girl had left.—Wilmington News.
