CIRCUMVENTING WIREWORMS.

Fall Cultivation the Best of All Methods. Poisoned Clover Baits.

Among the most prominent of the pests that infest field crops are the wireworms. These are long, slender grubs of a yellowish white color, and with unusually hard bodies. They resemble fine and the hardness of the body have suggested the common name. Fig. 1 in the cut represents a wireworm about twice natural size. Unfortunately the term wireworm has been misapplied to certain animals—the millipedes—which are not true insects, but belong to a different class in the animal kingdom. Fig. 2 in the cut represents a millipede. The true wireworms are the young of click beetles, or snapping bugs as they are more commonly termed. The common kinds of click beetles are mostly small or of medium size. A few are larger. They are usually of a uniform brownish color. Some are conspicuously spotted. A click beetle is represented at Fig. 3.

Three years' experimenting with both defensive and offensive measures at the Cornell station failed to discover a single satisfactory method of protecting seed, or of destroying immature wireworms in the soil. The scope of these experiments was large, embracing all the known methods. Professor Klingerland tells, however, in his report that fall cultivation will destroy the wireworms ready to pupate, the pupa and the beetles. The beetles can also be trapped and killed in large numbers with poisoned sweet baits. Such a short rotation of crops as will include a period of thorough cultivation in the fall will prove the best method of fighting these pests yet suggested.

In experimenting with poisoned baits, instead of those attracting the wireworms, as was expected, their parents, the click beetles, came to the baits in large numbers. The clover attracted by far the larger number, 65 per cent. It was found that the beetles were the most active at night, and that they sick their foot nicely by running over the surface of the ground. The wads of poisoned clover baits were placed under boards in various parts of a badly infested field.

New Potatoes.

In looking over the spring catalogues, the Money Maker potato is conspicuous, not only from its name, but from the claims made by those interested. It is claimed to be the "most productive potato in America and absolutely rot proof." It is a late sort.

Uncle Sam is another newcomer for which phenomenal merits are claimed, such as heavy yielder, shallow eyes, good form and extra cooking qualities. Honest Abe, also new, it is said, is "as early as the Early Rose and better in every way." Our readers, while interested in all that is new, will plant largely of old and well tested varieties until time has proved the new sorts worthy of general acceptance. In the mean time it often pays to experiment to a small way with novelties as they appear.
