THE DARKEY IN THE SOUTH

He Is Decidedly Objected to by the White Man as an Legal Associate.

Will Work Cheap, for a Little Pay Perhaps, and in Case of Bad Weather.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Aug. 5, 1896.

To the Editor:

The colored man is no great favorite in the South since slavery has been abolished. The laboring white people would prefer that he was back in Africa, for the negro will work in the cities for $1.50 a week and his board. The hotel keepers, livery stable owners and many wealthy people in the cities are glad they are here, as the money paid out for the work comes in but little. Many of the owners of the larger plantations would rather have them here, as they like to have a lot of colored people to hoe, and then they can hire them for their board and a little nothing without paying out any solid cash.

If the colored man accumulates a little wealth, and desires to live in respectable and fashionable city districts, nobody will sell to him. Sometimes a negro is able to make such a purchase through a white man, but whenever this happens, all his neighbors, for a square around, become displeased and make every effort to get him out of the neighborhood. The same rule is followed with the renting of houses and property; so generally the negroes are under the necessity of living in certain quarters along with others of their own color.

In nearly every city of the South there is a section which belongs to the colored population usually called by some name, as "Georgetown" or "Cincinnatus," or distinguished by some distinct from the balance of the town. Then the railway service of the South draws the separating line between the white and colored people very plainly—on every train that leaves the depots there are cars marked "For White People," and cars marked "For Colored People."

The negroes of the South are divided into three pretty distinct classes—the well-to-do negro who has others working for him; the negro who is making a daily living; and the indigent pilferers who depend for a living on the number of chickens and other fowls they can steal. The majority of colored people, though, don't seem to bother their heads much over financial affairs. Just so they have enough to eat day-by-day, they seem to be as free from care and as happy as children.

The colored people of the South have their own schools, with teachers of their own color presiding. In the cities they have their lawyers, and doctors, and preachers. The negroes, as a rule, like to attend church services. In one city I was in, there had been a "protracted meeting" going on for two months,—meeting every night—and the church was crowded all the time, and many sinners had come up to the "mourner's bench and got religion," and been taken jovially into the fold of the church. Many of the darkies are fine singers, and when the whole congregation in a church are singing it sounds splendidly. The darkies like the warm summer weather. I was walking along a pike road the other day with my umbrella up, and just roasting—the thermometer only registered 100 degrees in the shade—and I met an old darkey coming up the road with a pitchfork in one hand and a bucket of nice cool looking water in the other.

"Mighty warm," said I. "have you some drinking water there?"

"Yaah," he said, "keep yourself."

"This weather just suits me," he went on; "I can't stand cold weather."

And it's the same with all the darkies—they all like the warm weather best.

Last winter, as the story goes, there was a colored protracted meeting going on, and the preacher in telling his congregation where they would go if they didn't repent, spoke of Satan's regions as a place where pitchforks would be thrown at the people all the time. After meeting one of the members of his congregation came up to admonister a gentle reprove, and he asked him why he told the people this. The preacher replied by saying that he didn't care to tell them it was a heated region for fear some of his rheumatic congregation would want to go there too bad.

The watermelons are ripe here in "Ole Kaintuck" now, the corn-top's fodder, and the birds are making music "In summer and the darkies is as gay."

No appetite. This is not to be wondered at when you consider the most scientific means of imparting tone to the stomach. How? Why, by using Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and in a concentrated condition, that appetite will come again, and come to stay.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral relieves in time the harassed mother's fear of summer and some of the most dangerous of infantile complaints. Yet please the necessity of keeping this concentrated medicine within reach so that it may be readily resorted to at the first sign of need.
