JOY AND PAIN.

If there was never any shade or pain,
Joy would be joy, and pain would be pain;
If there were nothing on the dusty street
But sunshine, we should not care to meet
The shadow that falls across our way
We know the difference when the wall shrinks into day.

Joy and pain are gifts for humanity's best;
Pain to the soul as much as joy to the breast;
Pain to the soul as much as to the eye
Joy and pain. Ah, let us not forget.
Through the dark night of pain we get
Glimpses of the stars, which, for the rest and night
Are hidden from us by the light.
Pain is but seeds to freshness or a lack,
Friend of it will pass as at our back.

THE ALIBI.

Jim Blake was shot dead in his own doorway by Antonio Guelda and the ball was from off directly.

The extraordinary interest in the affair was due to the number and peculiar circumstances thereof. In the first place, the first case tried at San Inez in any more formal court than the two-handed institution of Judge Lynch.

In there was no place specially arranged for the trial, Judge Pillsbury had ordered the use of his shed. Here a rough table and chair were placed for the judge, the other necessary furniture, intended to represent the dock, the witness stand, being sent with Blake from the Bagnell grocery store.

Jim Smith looked at from prejudice for a time with frowning decision, and he was decidedly the prisoner, among jurymen who had heard Blake's story. When he neared the door of the shanty he leaned against the jamb and pulled his wilted hard hatbrim, turning himself to an unknown quantity, and then he stepped out of a hat. He had come there with the intention of saying something, but the sight which made him forget it.

Blake's widow sat there, as she had sat every evening for two days, her eyes, staring straight before her, with no rest in her pulse. The sunlight came through the foliage of the orchard trees that grew before the door, and the leaves set up a dancing half-circle on her and shadle in which a little chubby was playing.

Now it was just as it had to do there for one month it be only three days—ever since Jim had been shot down, and not minding to look after the drying clothes and let him standing in the door (the radio done had he was of the "Gulch" of it was when the lead broke of the pistol and ran in with careful stone of suffocating frightened the same as when she had found her lying upon the cradle, fainting its white lines, with its blood and the baby playing with its hair. She remembered, for first and last complaint anyone could hard for maker, that she was cool and helpful through it all—when Jim came and lifted him up, when they had laid him on the couch and in the other room, when they carried him to the grave, she following with his baby in her arms.

John Smith was trying to find the lad running in his disorder he stuffed with politicity—or something—and Blake's widow looked up without speaking. Jim nodded pleasantly four or five times.

"Pretty chipper" asked he.

Blake's widow smiled sadly, best over the strong child and contrasted the smile with a tender touch.

"They mean to try him in a court," John went on, "an I don't believe——"

"Thy who—Antonio?" She turned to want the baby's face in the door with a look of interest in her black eyes.

"Yes. The judge is making a court out of the shed. I hope it'll turn out all right, but it seems like giving that Mexican half a chance he oughtn't to have."

"He can't get clear, can he?" she asked, rocking the cradle gently and patting its occupant.

"I don't see how, but he's got some kind of a law case to appeal to—like as little that I expect been a day or two ago to say to Guthrie—and it makes me kind of nervous."

Blake's widow did not appear to notice her last remark, for the child, disturbed by the talking, had awakened and set up in his cradle with a wondering look.

"Poor, she's hot" said John, regarding the small figure with interest. "Looks just like—there—you. Four little—I—be ashamed, and treated his hat in a nervous enemy. "Of course he'd have to be got—There's nothin I could do for you, maybe?"

He answered with a grateful look, but it was accompanied by a shake of the head.

She bent down and with its big fat finger softly coupled the hair of the baby's head; then he went out and left him. Blake's widow sitting as he found her and the baby staring down the path after him.

He walked on until he reached the top of the little hill, where he could look down upon the roof which covered the house where he had left Jim. He seemed to have half a mind to turn back, for he hesitated and stopped but he changed his partial intention after having a moment and walked medium fast towards, with the exclamation, "Well, some women do beat the d—l sometimes."

Of course everybody came to the trial. The witnesses were soon found to be altogether too numerous. Philadelphia was filled to overflowing and Bagnell made a clean sweep of every empty hay in his store.

Antonio Guelda's lawyer, a sharp eyed, sharp features fellow from Galveston, had hinted about with surprising agility on the day previous, holding mysterious conferences with ill conditioned fellows of Blake's kidney.

The court was assembled, the jury had been chosen, and the witnesses were all present save one—Blake's widow.

Twice over there was a stir at the door, then a murmur of surprise ran through the crowded room.

"Why I do d—l," said John Smith, aside, "if she hasn't brought her baby!"

The reason she may have had for not having the little thing in charge of some sympathizing woman—and there were plenty who would have been glad to use trouble—was not apparent; however that might be, there it was, clasped firmly to her arms, its bright red cheeks contrasting with her whiteness, and its flaxen sunny hair mingling with her own black.

With some difficulty way was made through the throng to her seat, which had been placed on one side of the table directly opposite the castle box, on the other, where Antonio sat. She took her place but never moved during her stay, the child, excepting an one was required to hearty, she sat——

The lady raised at some distinct thing that lay hidden in the folds of her dress, at which she took pains to distract its attention with a chip from the floor. As for the baby, it sat there with its big blue eyes fixed in blank fallen astonishment, so intent in the novel scenery, for the moment when that brought the glitter caught its eye.

Every one being now present, the trial went on in good earnest. A number of witnesses were examined, whose testimony showed that Guelda had had trouble with Blake, and were then questioned by the defendant's counsel, was one charge—only on the evening of the murder, whereas in the morning it had been full that he was seen that morning around Blake's house, and here was that Blake's widow had heard Guelda's voice you before the front door, and had seen him retreating as she ran out.

At this hot point the Galveston lawyer asked the witness a few questions, guessing how she knew it was Guelda, and how she had recognized the voice for his. She didn't know her exactly, but was sure that it was for him.

There had been a rumor about that some one had heard Antonio make a boast of "having done for Blake this time," but if there were a witness for this he could not be found now.

And so the prosecution closed.

The Galveston lawyer began by re-reading in a whispered of subpoenas with traditions the witness who had sworn to having seen Guelda down the path. Then he expatiated on the case with which the thing had been accomplished was unknown. He threw a discussion back toward Philadelphia, but the jurors was neighbored and effort were to be interested with things in Jake's vicinity.

"Gentlemen of the jury," said he, "the victim took a seat I think after gentlemen, I don't know as there's need to be said. I appeal you've got to go by the evidence, as that don't seem quite explicable. If you his make out, accusing to that, that Antonio Guelda killed Jim Blake, why, you confess Blake's wife yet lives for."

John Smith lighted along on his toy and sent anxious glances through the open door toward the shanty of Blake where the jury was deliberating.

Antonio talked with longest to counsel, defendant with his counsel, and Blake's widow not moving at them with compressed lips and a strong expression of determination coming into her face.

It wasn't long before the jury filed in and the judge, standing on the spectators, and Judge Pillsbury was waiting for Prudence with his chief sheriff.

"Gentlemen is not have yet" asked he, looking to the spectators.

The man nodded in return.

"Are we," said the spokesman, with a hesitating and disappointed air, "of the belief as specified in the jury's verdict, that Antonio Guelda is not guilty."

Pillsbury didn't have to look at everybody he stared up at the rafters, down at the table, nowhere in particular, and then turned half way toward the prisoner.

"You Sin go," said he at last, and with great deliberation, "but don't stay around here too long."

There was a long pause, during which nobody moved.

Jake Smith exploded a single oaths word which he had held in for some time back, and Blake's widow stood up.

"Have you got through, judge," she asked.

"Well—I—I guess so."

"And there is nothing else to be done?"

"I am afraid there is not."

"And he's free to go?"

"Yes."

Antonio Guelda arose with an insolent grin and pushed up his hat.

The baby crowed, for it saw the glittering thing again.

Then was a sharp report—Antonio pitched forward in a heap upon the floor and Blake's widow stood with the pistol pressed to her breast.

A line of thin blue smoke curled from the muzzle of the weapon and formed a bluish cloud the child's frozen head. The glittering thing was quite near the little face, and they kept it from the yielding grasp of the mother.

Blake's widow looked steadily at the figure on the floor—it was quite motionless. Then she turned and went through the wide passage opened for her by the silent crowd, holding the baby very tenderly, and the baby carrying the pistol.

The child laughed with delight at had got fascinating plaything again.—Detroit News.

A lady was showing little Eddie some pictures of birds, among which was a nightingale. The lady told Eddie that it was a bird which sang beautifully in the night, adding, "We have no nightingales in this country, as they have in England." "Sho," replied Eddie pensively, "but we have cats that sing in the night. I often hear them."—New York Advertiser.

THE AFRICAN BUSH.

A Terror Inspiring Land Where Silence and Death Dwell Side by Side.

Tom Pitcher lately purchased an antique doctor's wagon on the top of a height on a summer's holiday. Not a ceramic stone saw a hole, and the sun poured down its rays on the fallen, dried covered leaves of the bushes. When the driver has gone to lie down behind the bushes and the horse is gone to take the oxen to water, if you stand up alone on the crest at the front of the wagon and look out you will see as far as your eye can reach over hills and dales the silent, motionless bush bush stretching.

Not a sound is to be heard, and the heat is so intense your head whirls on the top of the wagon where you have rested. Presently there is a drop of bush at your feet a cricket sets up its note within cry, chirping in the heat and solitude of the bush. Not one character actually do you see it when, as a little child, you travel through it in the night.

The ox wagon creeps slowly along the sandy road. The driver, walking beside it, calls at intervals to his oxen; then we look out across the wagon cover and see as the waves move along how the dark outlines of the bushes on either side seem to move, too, a great dusky scene coming nearer and nearer for a few moments, the shape accompanied by the dark.

We creep closer down behind the wagon cover and look out across it. Against the dark night sky to our right, on the ridge of the hill, are the great forms of aloes standing like a row of men keeping watch. We remember an an aloes we have heard of. Fairy wars and men shall be stalked as they passed along the aloes, and of wild animals, and we creep down lower; then a wild of the wagon comes out from some dried in torrent bed and far away we dance to and and among the clumps of bush now in night and now out again.

You are glad when the people in the wagon begin to sing hymns, and more glad yet when at 9 of the wagon stops, driver up unload a great clump of bush at the front, and the tired eyes can lie down out from the yoke and every one climbs out and a fire is lighted, and you gather from far and wide stumps of dried elephant's foot and eighteen what you can dig with your hand, and bits of scrub—wood to the fire, and there leaps on the fire the flame leaps higher and higher and all sit down to eat the ruddy blaze.

Away behind another bush the driver and boxes have halted, then he is back and talking the boxes to Kafir as they come in the cooks and gather the meat. The blaze of your own fire leaps upward flames the great and dusty body of the wagon with its white sails, and glares on the horses of the third oxen, where they lie back as under yoke, chewing the cud, and on the bush with its dark green leaves behind you, and you laugh out and and forget the stories of Kafir wars and the great bush swallowing about you.—Portsmouth Review.

How Prudence Saved Blessed.

It is perhaps not generally known that when a young man is desirous of a quiet conversation with the young lady of his choice, he has to be quite a clever official register in one of the courts of justice. In those days he danger sometimes put the lover of late, but upon an occasion of that kind he will need his wits about him. This was when, questioned as a witness, the lover was to an impudent over, whereupon Prudence exclaimed angrily.

"If you are not as respectful as should ha'e you out of the room."

"Do you mean, sir," said the judge, interrupting the proceedings, "I would have you understand that this is a dignified court of justice and that if there is any talking to be done the court will do it."

"Ahm, you see!" said Prudence to the witness, "if you are not more respectful to go the court will have you out of the room, so be careful—very careful, sir!"—San Francisco Argonaut.

The Stillness Stakes.

A most interesting phenomenon is the stillness in Ireland. He is not a bad man. He is amiable, and he has no be managed. He is neatly dressed for a tinker. He is a man who is constantly devising schemes to accomplish the things which make their joint lives a success.

He has no suspicion of this. If he had he would be as sad by would undoubtedly cut her. So all through life she goes on swinging a tassel ahead of his nose to make him go the same as though he were a lucky mule. She is a cheery little body, and she grows plump with every year, and the dose her smiling behind the door or she chuckles in her sleeve when he is fed by. The stillness husband is so interesting as a bug.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Meanings of Several Names.

Asia means morning of east. Europe, evening or west; Australia means lying to or in the south. Hence we may consider that these mean eastern land, western land and southern land. Asia is a Greek word. Europe is a Hebrew one; Australia is a Latin word. The origin of the word Africa is uncertain. Some conjecture that it is a Semitic word, meaning "Land of Wanderers."—St. Louis Republic.

The inventor of the wonderful engine ship has made a model of that type which he claims will be the best boat ever devised for coast defense. This may well be, but we must not forget that such vessels will after all be only a variation of brave old John Ericsson's monitors.

"German Syrup"

The majority of well-read physicians now believe that Consumption is a germ disease. In other words, instead of being in the constitution itself it is caused by bacteria small enough to lodge in the lungs, breeding an insidious fever and eating them away as caterpillars do the leaves of trees.

A Germ Disease.

The phlegm that is coughed up in these parts of the lungs which have been greased off and destroyed. These little bacilli, as the germs are called, are too small to be seen with the naked eye, but they are very much alive just the same, and once the body in any local, in the air you breathe, and through the pores of the skin. These they go into the blood and finally arrive at the lungs, where they fasten and increase with rapidity equalled. Then German Syrup comes in, loosens the bills there, expels them, but the germs have gone, and so, in general and so the trial, in a short time consumption becomes germ-proof and well.
