Exciting Adventure of a Young Lady with a Panther.

A MAN WITH $53,000 DISAPPEARS.

Fight Between a Bird and a Spotted Bull—Remarkable Escape from a Violent Death.

The Wasatch Wave is informed that the ore at the mines of Lake creek is running so abundantly that it is going the most of which fell last Saturday during the day and night.

The badly decomposed body of a man was found near Marlboro, Ariz., on Thursday. It is supposed to be the remains of a carpenter named Colby who had been working at Marlboro a few days this summer.

A small fly, which some call the bull-fly, has been bothering cattle in the west of Lordsburg, Wyo., for some time. They do not live on the blood of the cattle, but extract the fat in the skin. They are small, with a bright white.

There is a move on foot for a "bull-dress ball," to be given within the next two weeks, says the Western Wave. A dance of this kind will be quite a novelty here and a reminder of early days, when grain, peasoos, carpets, butter, etc., were taken with which to buy tickets.

It is reported that the young women of Hooper have organized a Home Industry club, and they have dished out their mothers' and grandmothers' spinning wheels and put them in running order. The wool is sent to Utah to be carded. They will spin all the stocking yarn needed in the town and probably enough yarn to make themselves fancy dresses for the winter. We wish them success. We hope it may prove the success of a woolen mill in the near future. This is from the Deseret Advocate.

Miss Cox, the lady telegraph agent at Cape Beale lighthouse on the west coast, had an exciting adventure in that wild portion of the country one evening, remarks the Victoria Times. She was out for a walk, accompanied by a couple of dogs. The latter started a large panther from its lair. The panther, seeing Miss Cox, started for her, evidently determined on an attack. She stood still screaming for assistance. Her cries brought one of the dogs to her side, and also started her younger brother to her assistance with a rifle. The panther came so close, snarling and whining all the time, that she was afraid to move but it stood spring on her. At last she caught hold of the dog and threw it squarely on top of the big cat. A fierce fight then began between the two. At this juncture Miss Cox's brother arrived with the gun, and seeing it the young lady soon put an end to the duel and the life of the savage panther with a well-directed stick.

A hunter who was looking for game discovered a fight which he represent between a red and spotted bull. Unanimitly the infuriated beasts approached each other with lowered heads and their eyes flashing fire. When they got within twenty yards one from the other they stealthily moved forward step by step, evidently trying to get an advantage over the other. Suddenly they jumped, locked horns and the terrible conflict began. They struggled with all their might and main, first one gaining an advantage and then the other, for when returned to the reporter a full half hour, when the red bull, by a terrible charge, succeeded in driving the head of the spotted one, and by a quick movement gored him in the belly letting the entrails out. The bellowing of the wounded and now frightened beast could have been heard for miles. The spotted bull, with outrage hanging out, returned the charge, and succeeded in ripping open the stomach of his opponent, and again they came together, but were so badly wounded that finally one topped over, and the other soon followed. The result I relate below, as I saw it.—Red Lodge Daily Advance.

The peculiar action of the electric current is sometimes very interesting, as well as amusing. Mr. M. E. Young, who resides at Upper Alton, says the Portland Oregonian, went into her yard the other day to gather some plums. The fire ran she touched one bee on electric shock. Again she tried to gather the plums, and every time she touched one she received a strong shock. Thinking the amount for the occurrence, she called in a neighbor, and she went through the same experience, and got a plum could then get. Mr. Meadow was called, and he started toward the place where the bulbs were standing, and came in contact with a electric bulb of a circuit. In attempting to remove the chains, as he could pass, his hands came into contact with the line, and he received a shock that knocked him down. The act to investigate, made with great caution, and it was discovered that the electric light wire connected with the house was broken, and had fallen across the clothesline, one end of which was attached to the plum tree. The line and clothes were damp and formed a good conductor. Also when a plum was touched a circuit was completed and a shock received.

To fall down a shaft fifty-seven feet and live is a most remarkable experience. Such, however, has been the thrilling experience of Frank Young, says the Los Angeles Herald. Mr. Young is one of the contractors on the outfall sewer. The shaft is section 3 of the big sewer is fifty-seven feet deep and is entered by means of an elevator run by an engine. Mr. Young stepped on the cage at the elevator and signaled the engineer to start he go. Often when the signal of descent was given the engineer would open the throttle and allow the elevator to descend for first 20 feet at a lightning speed, making simply a drop, not slowing up until reaching the tunnel level, but when the engineer attempted to do so his signal cords yesterday it was attended with disastrous results. He opened the throttle and the cage shot down the shaft at a most terrific speed. The engineer saw that his engine was beyond control and thought Young had met a horrible death, and rushed to the shaft. Below by Young in a crouched up position, apparently dying. The work of rescue was at once begun and the unfortunate man taken to the top. He was totally paralyzed in the lower part of his body and was almost unconscious. The injured man sustained no fractures. His legs were, however, covered with severe cuts and contusions. He was badly bruised, but will recover.

A man with $53,000 in his possession disappeared mysteriously on September 19th from San Francisco, and the business world of that city is in a ferment. The missing man is Charles Yung, a young man from St. Louis. He called at the residence of W. S. Harrison on the day he disappeared and asked for Harrison. Mrs. Harrison told him that her husband was at work at Mission-st. foundry, at the foot of Fourth street, where he was employed as foreman. Young went there, and Harrison recognized him as a friend who had not seen for fifteen years. Young told Harrison that he had been in Butte, Mont. He had sold mining property adjoining that of a rich syndicate. Yesterday the syndicate bought for $53,000, which he had left him in deals on the Bank of California. As he told the story, Young produced a market to show he was, at the same time taking the place to accompany him to the bank and identify him, so that he could deposit his drafts and draw on them. Harrison reserved him to go out again to the Harrison's home and Young's message to his wife to accept, to meet the absent and go with Young to the bank. Young said he would get his luggage and take it to his friend's house. He then left the number yard and has not been seen since. Foul play is suspected. The matter was put into the hands of a detective, who went to the Bank of California, but found that they had not seen him nor received any money in Harrison's name. No one at the house of Young's friends has reported and no clue to his name has been presented to the bank. The police think it probable that Harrison may have mistaken the amount of the bank. The chief of police has prepared a description of Young to be put over the telegraphic wires, and a telegram has been received in reply. No answer has been received as yet.

DR. SCHENCK'S

Mandrake Pills have a value as a household remedy far beyond the powerful language in describing. The family can hardly be expected that does not keep them on hand to use in emergencies.

* MANDRAKE *

is the only vegetable substitute for that dangerous mineral, Mercury, and while its action as a cathartic is fully equal, it possesses none of its perilous effects.

In Constipation, Mandrake acts upon the bowels without disposing them to subsequent costiveness.

No remedy acts so directly on the liver, nothing so speedily cures Sick Headache, Sour Stomach and Biliousness as these
