THE SON OF THE SHEIK.

The smell of the warm slime on the Jelliffe river and the sweet, heavy and sickening odor that exhaled into the inspirable heat of the desert air from the bunches of coral and scarlet water beetle is with me yet; also the sight of the long stretch of dry mud bank, rising by shallow and barely perceptible degrees to the edge of the desert sands, and thus thickened by the shrinkage of the Jelliffe during the hot months. Ha! I can remember just how those mud banks looked. They were very broad and very black—except where they touched the desert, and there the sand had sifted over them in light, transparent sprinklings—and in rapidly drying under the sun of the Sahara had cracked and warped into thousands of little concentric circles, such as all the world like little saucers in which Indian ink has been mixed. (If you are an artist, as was Thevenet, you will the better understand this.)

Then there was the reach of the desert that drew off on either hand, and that rolled away, away in gentle, toward the place where the yellow sky dropped down out of sight behind the shimmering horizon, swelling gently and gradually like some mighty breast, which, panting for breath in the terrible heat, had risen in a final gasp, and had then, in the midst of it, suddenly stiffened and become rigid, while on this colossal breast of the desert, where nothing stirred but the waning light in the morning and the waning light in the night, lay tumbled red and gray rocks, with their drifts of sand in their cities and environs and gray green cacti squatting or sprawling in their blue shadows. And there was nothing more—nothing, nothing, nothing—except the appalling heat and the oscillating silence.

And in the midst of it all—we.

"We," Sidney Pennington, generally speaking, were the small right wing of General Pourtenu's division of the African service, speaking less broadly and less generally "we" were the advance guard of said division, and speaking in the narrowest and most particular sense "we" were the party at war correspondent, sketch artist, etc., etc., etc., who were accompanying said advance guarded said wing of said army of said service for ennui herein to be set forth.

As the long, flat, black snow of the commissariat wind sweeping up the tented floor, with the advance guard straggling along upon the right, "we" lay upon the dock under the shadow of the crew's awning and looked and drank homesoever.

"I guess now what had led up to it, but Pourenau had said that the Arabs were patriots, when Bab Asmon sat in sad and smoothing which I shall repeat as soon as I have told you about Bab Asmon himself.

Briefly, then, Bab Asmon had been twenty-nine years before this time at "Toulouse, of Middle France." He was a stalk—had been transplanted to France at the age of 16, and had flourished there in a truly remarkable manner. He had graduated fifth from the Polytechnique, he had written books that had been "reviewed in the Academie," he had become noticed; he had been prominent in politics—no one can cut a wide swath in Paris in anything without hitting against a politique; he had occupied important positions in two embassies, he was a dight, most of he most qualities; he had lots of influence, he dressed in faultless French fashion, he had entered Cromwell, he had set money on him; he had applied to the government for the office of "Scrivener des Bureaux-Arabes dans l'Orin," in order to prove to his obstinate Dad that he could win "his," and was now on this, his first visit to his fatherland since he took pear, on his way to his post.

Voila Bab Asmon.

And when Pourenau had spoken thus about the patriotism of the Arabs, Bab Asmon sat sad and smoothing which I shall repeat as soon as I have told you about Bab Asmon himself.

Briefly, then, Bab Asmon had been twenty-nine years before this time at "Toulouse, of Middle France." He was a stalk—had been transplanted to France at the age of 16, and had flourished there in a truly remarkable manner. He had graduated fifth from the Polytechnique, he had written books that had been "reviewed in the Academie," he had become noticed; he had been prominent in politics—no one can cut a wide swath in Paris in anything without hitting against a politique; he had occupied important positions in two embassies, he was a dight, most of he most qualities; he had lots of influence, he dressed in faultless French fashion, he had entered Cromwell, he had set money on him; he had applied to the government for the office of "Scrivener des Bureaux-Arabes dans l'Orin," in order to prove to his obstinate Dad that he could win "his," and was now on this, his first visit to his fatherland since he took pear, on his way to his post.

Voila Bab Asmon.

"I agree," answered Bab Asmon; "yet patriotism can be more or less narrow. Idiomatically I will explain—a sixteen-year-old boy—I was sixteen when I left my father's side to the dark on his elbow, and pointed with the amber mouthpiece of his chibouk. "In looking backward upon the gradual development of patriotism in the minds of men since the days when they first began to band together, you can see it pass through five very distinct stages. Patriotism, first, was but love of family—of parents and kindred, but then as the family grows and expands into the tribe, it becomes merely a large family—becomes the object of affection, of patriotic devotion. This is the second stage—the stage of the tribe, the clan, the gens, men call themselves of the Cedar tribe, of the Clan Chattan, of the Gens Fabianus. In the third stage, the tribe has sought protection behind the influence of walls. It is the age of cities, patriotism is the devotion to the city. Men are Athenians or Corcyrans, Romans or Italians, Carthaginians or Africans. In the fourth stage, patriotism means affection for the state, for the country, for the province, and Burgundian, Norman and Fleming give family for their home—hood for Burgundy, Normandy and Flanders, while we of today form the issue, but not the last, link of the beginning and end. Patriotism, among which are coffee pots and burned as an iron plate, some burned as an oath, whether boiled with nutrets and spread on the floor and tied with a piece of a shoe.

Ladies and gentlemen made among the ancient Greeks and Romans were plain heaps of gold or silver in their ears, and as time progressed they became more elaborate, products gems being set in them.

Just Made of Garrie.

Two little girls were overheard speaking about their mamas' dresses from an attack of sore throat with which each had been ailing.

"What did your mamma give you?" asked little Amy of Helen.

"Oh, she made me gargle my throat with lemonade. What did you do?"

"Oh, I had to gargle mine with glory of potash!"—Detroit Free Press.

Dangers of Gardening.

A mistake is often made by setting the lawn mower to cut too short, and there is not enough of the leaf growth left to give strength to the roots of the grass. A more natural condition is given by cutting a little higher, and the lawn is made more like velvet, and there would be less danger of the earth below being dried or burned by exposure to the sun. Owners and gardeners are sometimes puzzled to know what to do under the shade of trees where grass will not grow freely. The best remedy is a free mulching with Kennedy's blackgrass, which will enhance shade better than most other lawn grasses.

Testing Cream and Butter.

Getting Less Butter Than the Cream Test Indicates.

Creamery men inform us that at times they are unable to make cream hold out. It is not meant by this that the standard gauge of cream fails to make a pound of butter, but that the butter churned is less than the test indicates. We are asked what is the matter. The buttermilk tank is a good place to commence investigations when the butter churned out is less than the test.

It is perhaps possible to recover practically all the butter fat and yet have the butter fall short. If the cascine and water is less than 12 per cent. of the total cream, or if the cream test is over 30 per cent. of butter fat, it is presumable that the weight will fall short. An analysis of fifteen samples of butter showed a range of fat content from 80.29 to 87.36, averaging about 84. The cream test is gauged to allow for 80 per cent. of butter fat. Butter which contains 80 per cent. of fat will, however, fall short a trifle, as a little fat goes into the buttermilk. If it contains 85 per cent. of fat there should be no mistake. If it contains less than 80 per cent. it should overrun, and, in fact, well ordered creameries will naturally secure a surplus.

The principle of the cream test may be briefly stated thus: Five inches in depth in the test tube is said to hold out when it yields one and one-tenth inches of butter fat. This shows just 22 per cent. of fat in the cream. A gauge of cream weighs four pounds and is estimated to churn out one pound of butter.

Four pounds of 22 per cent. fat condensed to one pound will be 88 per cent. fat—more than 80 per cent. of average butter. As the creamery management does all the measuring, testing and weighing, the patron has no opportunity to overhaul the creamery, and a failure to make good the test is as much an injury to the patron as it is to the creamery. The patron should test him to watch the churning with an intelligent eye.

But the milk test is different. It should always overrun. The test shows four pounds of butter in a hundred of milk, but it is therefore assuming the test to be correctly made. If the butter maker fails to churn out four pounds of butter fat, the separator or the cream, or both, do defective work. More than this, it should overrun because of the weight of water, caseine and salt remaining in the manufactured butter. It would be very interesting if our readers would report how milk tests agree with the churns. We intend to keep a close run rule regarding the amount it should overrun in weight, as we do not want to encourage having the butter loaded with water. How many find it overrun more than 10 per cent. and how many less?

If all the butter fat gets into the buttermilk, and none is lost in the skimmilk and buttermilk, 88 per cent. butter will overrun nearly 10 per cent. Will it? Let us have reports.—Creamery Journal.

The Cow for Florida.

In the live stock department of the Ocala exposition there were some representing the Holstein-Friesian, the Ayrshire, Devon and Jersey breeds. While we admired the splendid appearance of the Experiment station's animal and the portsdown steer in the Shorthorns, we could see no reason to change the opinion formed six years ago that the Jersey and its grades were the cattle for their climate.

While primarily considered as cows for butter, the Jersey steer will rough it on Florida pastures and make fine beef. A decided improvement in the quality of beef offered in the Tallahassee market over that killed a few years ago can only be traced to the infusion of the Jersey blood, as bulls of the other breeds have succumbed to the heat of the summer. While the Jerseys themselves are prone to be attacked as well as the others, they will recover quicker and the percentage of loss is not so great.

A large cow requires a large amount of feed, and if the feet to search for it a portable house would be necessary to keep up with her, and we have yet to see the planter in this state who has enough feed to satisfy even the small Jersey.

Even here in Florida feed must be provided for the winter months, for there is a time when the pastures are bare, and unless fed from the barn or silo cattle suffer as much so on the western ranges. The latter method of starting feed seems to fill a long felt want, and from unavailing causes nothing has been made to fill corn the past season, we make it very much.

Any one with land able to grow corn and handy with hatchet and saw can construct a silo. I will be glad to inform any one where to get the best plan embodying the latest ideas.

Where one has the time to devote to it properly, the calf should be raised by hand, and it is not so hard to do as one would imagine.—W. H. Schrader in Southern Live Stock Journal.

Notes.

Hog raising and dairying go well together.

That Ohio authority, John Gould, says that 42 degs. is the best temperature at which milk can be set. He declares, moreover, that good keeping butter cannot be made with ice, and that "our mothers" had much to learn in the art of making butter that would keep several weeks in perfect condition.

Two dairy cows well fed and cared for are worth more than six long legged, half starved ones.

A. D. Baker declares that sweet skimmilk is not as valuable to young calves till they are a year old as to feed pigs.

The Railroad Presidents Meet.

Judge McWhorter is president of the shortest railroad system in the world. It is something more than three miles in length, between Crawford and Lexington, in other words, they have to travel only a good heavy Jaunt.

"Hang me in New York a few minutes ago," said Larry Taft while in Commissioner John Inman's office he and Jay Gould. He was introduced to the wizard as the president of the Lexington Terminal.

"Yes," said Mr. Gould, "I am glad to meet you. You have a nice road. By the way, Mr. McWhorter, how many miles are there in your system?"

"Nineteen," replied Harp.

"All right and magnificent!" said Mr. Gould from force of habit."—Atlanta Constitution.

Among the women's crazes in New Jersey are some that have named themselves "The Sparrows," because they live on the remains that fall from the big visitor tables. In other words, they have been seen collecting of the papers from one or more large clubs in the state.
